Mr. GORE. I wish to express the hope that the Senator might find time and take occasion to answer a point raised by the Senator from Indiana. He made a very eloquent plea in behalf of the disabled soldiers, those who stopped bullets, suffered wounds, and incurred other injuries in the military service of their country. I want to say that I concur in all that he said in behalf of those disabled veterans.

I am a new man here, however, and I am not as familiar with veterans' legislation as I ought to be and hope to be. The Senator from Pennsylvania is a veteran himself, he is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and a member of the Senate Finance Committee. I think that the soldiers who incur disability in line of military duty are entitled not only to justice but to generosity at the hands of this Government. I think not only that, but that their widows and their orphans who survive them are entitled to just and generous treatment. Any man whose earning capacity was impaired during the war, or whose life was spoiled on account of his military service, is entitled to reparation as far as governments can make reparation. We can not help the dead but we can help the surviving dependents of the dead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929, the pending question being the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] on page 18, line 11, to strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Oklahoma, I would say that I agree with every word he has said. During the 10 years of my service here I believe I have been at least as active as any other Member of the Senate in securing not only justice but generosity for those who were disabled as a result of their war services, and for the relatives of those who died as a result of war-time disability.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I intended to add that if the Government has been either derelict or niggardly in its duty toward such disabled veterans, it of course merits reprobation. I will go farther and say if the Government has been derelict toward any group of our veterans, it of course merits criticism. Would the Senator be good enough to review the record of legislation enacted for the benefit of World War veterans so that we can pass judgment upon that point?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it would take too long, I am afraid, to make a complete review of all we have done for our disabled veterans. Much of it has been forgotten in these days. The hundreds of millions of dollars that we paid out in vocational training after the armistice is all forgotten now. Many, many millions that have been spent in hospitalization of veterans whose disability almost certainly had nothing to do with the war are all forgotten now. We have been generous almost to the point of absurdity in order that we might not be unjust to some meritorious case.

I wonder if the country realizes that under the present law a veteran who went crazy at any time prior to January 1, 1925, is conclusively presumed to be insane because of his war service, although he may have spent no more than a week in the service and may have spent all of that week in some quiet training camp out in the Middle West or in an office here in Washington? It is conclusively presumed that that one week's peaceable service caused his insanity if it occurred prior to December 31, 1924, although that service may have been of the most normal and natural kind, although he may have been a doctor on recruiting service, living at home overnight, doing normal work in his office, but commissioned during the day, and he may have served only a week before the armistice. If such a man got tuberculosis as late as December, 1924, he is conclusively presumed to be tubercular and therefore compensable because of the week that he served back in 1918.

If that is not generosity, I do not know what is. As a result of it our annual bill for the veterans amounts to more than a billion dollars. No nation in history was ever so generous to its military veterans. Our bill each year amounts to more than the aggregate that is spent by Great Britain, by Germany, by France, and by Italy combined. As to those countries, most of whom were in the war four years, but three years in the case of Italy, who all had ten times as many casualties as we had, their total expenditures for veterans' relief each year added together amounts to less than we alone are spending for our veterans.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Was that legislation handled in the House by the World War Veterans' Committee or the Ways and Means Committee or the Pensions Committee? There are several committees in the House vested with power to consider veterans' legislation.

Mr. REED. I do not understand the jurisdictional lines between the House committees. I know that the bonus bill was handled by the Ways and Means Committee. Why it was not handled by the World War Veterans' Committee I do not know, but it was the Ways and Means Committee that did the work in relation to that bill. The two bills they have sent to us, one dealing with term insurance—which, by the way, I hope will pass—and the other dealing with pensions for widows and orphans of non-service-connected cases, were handled by the World War Veterans' Committee in the House.

Mr. GORE. Was the legislation to which the Senator refers as being so generous handled in the Senate by the Pensions Committee or was it handled by the Finance Committee?

Mr. REED. It was handled by the Finance Committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The two bills which the Senator has just mentioned are the only bills pending before the Finance Committee in favor of which there has been any agitation, are they not?

Mr. REED. I think that is true, with the exception of perhaps a dozen letters that have come to me from people who stand to benefit by the special bills if they are passed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And they have only been before the committee a very short time, having come from the House recently?

Mr. REED. Yes; those two bills. The widows' pension bill came to the Senate on May 3 and the term insurance bill came on May 17.

Mr. President, one week after I came to the Senate, in August, 1922, I had the effrontery to rise in the Senate and make a speech against the bonus bill which was then pending. I have been fighting it ever since, and as long as I am in the Senate I am going to continue to fight the payment of bonuses to men who incurred no disability. But beginning at that same time—with the generous and able help of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I would like to say in passing—I have worked steadily and constantly for the disabled men and for the relatives of those who were killed in action or who have since died as a result of disability. Of that record I am proud. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] or the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] disagrees with me, I am sorry; but I am not going to change.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not rise to make any defense of the Finance Committee, but I can not allow the occasion to pass, in view of what has been said in debate, without paying tribute to the conscientious and able and patriotic service on the Finance Committee of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I have not agreed with his attitude on some of the problems dealing with veterans. I am not often in sympathy with his general political philosophy. But I do say, from my observation as a Member of this body, that I have found no Senator more industrious, more conscientious, and more courageous in his devotion to the public service, or more capable of arguing his studied convictions than the able Senator from Pennsylvania. I could speak at length in commendation of his public service from many years of observation of his labors in connection with veterans' legislation and as a member of the Finance Committee. He does not need any word of commendation from me or any other Senator. His record as a painstaking, diligent, and able Senator speaks for itself. I could not allow the occasion to go by without giving vent to the admiration that I have for him, regardless of political or other fundamental differences over public questions. I may say in this connection, too, that I think we have all been edified by the fine manner in which he has stood here on the floor of the Senate, often alone, taking uncomplainingly blow after blow, doing his duty as he sincerely believed was in the interest of his fellow men.

Mr. President, I do think that the Committee on Finance ought to have taken action in some of the matters that have been pending before them and upon which they have not taken action. I think the committee is subject to some criticism. I wish that our meetings had been called more frequently and that a wider opportunity had been presented to discuss some of the veterans' bills pending before the committee. I think the mere agitation of this matter has been helpful in drawing attention of the committee to the importance of the problem. I hope that before the session closes the bills pending before the Finance Committee in which the veterans' organizations are particularly interested will be reported and decisions made by the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief comment on the general subject matter which has been under discussion during the morning hours.

I have before me the calendar of the Finance Committee of June 13, 1932. I have made what I must confess is a hasty calculation, but there were 234 bills or joint resolutions, according to docket numbers, referred to the committee between the meeting of the Congress in December, 1931, and down to and including June 8, 1932. This includes not only legislation dealing with veterans but legislation dealing with all other subjects over which the Finance Committee exercises jurisdiction. Eliminating the bills creating hospitals in various sections of the country, which were acted on as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] stated by a general motion proposed in the committee to decline consideration of any bills providing for the creation of hospitals at particular points, I calculate that there are 119 bills and joint resolutions which have been referred to the Finance Committee during this session of Congress which have not been reported to the Senate. The number mentioned covers all manner of subjects, as I stated a moment ago, which are the subject of consideration by the Finance Committee.

I also wish to say that so far as I know this is the only major committee in the Senate which does not have a regular weekly meeting day. It meets only on call of the chairman. I believe I have been on this committee for approximately two years. Since I have been a member of the committee there has never been a call of the calendar of the committee.

The record disclosed by the calculations which I have just stated is typical of the record of the committee during the last session of Congress, except that at the last session, if my recollection serves me correctly, there was a much larger number of bills and joint resolutions which were introduced by Senators and referred to the Finance Committee or which came over from the House of Representatives and were referred to that committee.

In view of the criticism which has been leveled at the committee—and which I must confess I believe entirely justified, not only concerning veterans' legislation but concerning important bills which have been introduced dealing with other subjects and referred to that committee—I ask unanimous consent, as part of my remarks, to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the calendar of the Finance Committee, so that all Senators may have it readily available for reference. I ask this also in view of the statements which have been made concerning the resolution introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Finance Committee calendar is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE—LEGISLATIVE CALENDAR, SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, JUNE 13, 1932 (No. 11)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, as I conceive the functions of committees of the Senate, they are not designed for the purpose of pigeonholing or chloroforming legislation which it happens a majority of a committee does not favor. My conception of the function of a committee of the Senate is to obtain available information concerning all proposed legislation referred to it, to give it consideration, and then report the findings of the committee to the Senate, where a majority of the entire body may determine whether or not it agrees with the finding of a majority of the committee.

Since I have been a member of the Finance Committee I have on several occasions made an effort to have the committee set a definite day for meeting each week during the session, and to provide for the calling of the calendar, so that measures referred to the committee which may not meet the approval of the chairman or of other members of the committee might have an opportunity for their day in court before the committee and then an opportunity for consideration on the floor of the Senate. When the committee meets again in December I shall again renew my effort to secure an orderly, intelligent, and speedy consideration of measures that are referred to the committee rather than to have the fate of bills determined by the will of the chairman.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I rise to correct some misunderstandings which apparently are had by the Senator from Wisconsin. There are very few committees which have regular days for meeting. For instance, the Interstate Commerce Committee has no regular day for meeting, and upon repeated attempts to secure a quorum for meetings of that committee I have been unsuccessful. We have had pending before that committee for five or six months a bill to regulate motor trucks and motor busses which are operated in interstate commerce. I have called repeated meetings but have been unable to obtain a quorum and, therefore, have been unable to get action. We have also had before us a bill that passed the other House some time ago with respect to the regulation of lotteries by radio and other matters connected with radio transmission, but we have been unable to get a quorum to consider the measure.

I desire also to take issue with the Senator from Wisconsin with respect to the number of bills that are referred to committees. For instance, during my service here it has been the policy of practically every committee of which I know not to take up for serious consideration any pending legislation that is not urged by its author; in other words, a call of the calendar, so far as the Interstate Commerce Committee is concerned, has been had a number of times, and on each occasion the question has been asked, "Is the author of the bill pressing for the consideration of the measure?" When the answer has been in the negative, the committee has invariably passed the bill over. That is my experience so far as my committee work is concerned; and I have been here nearly 10 years. I make no defense of the Finance Committee as to some of these matters; but, in justice, I do say, as one of its members for a number of years, that we have not taken up legislation unless there has been an urgent request from the author of the legislation or some general public interest in it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to a case in point illustrative of the manner in which the Finance Committee transacts its business. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced a bill. He urged it upon the attention of the committee, and on the floor of the Senate called attention to the fact that the committee had not acted upon it, and, finally, in order to blast that bill out of the committee, had to move on the floor of the United States Senate that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the measure. This is an indication that the committee has no consideration for the author of the bill or for its importance when it declines to give consideration to an important measure introduced by a Senator, regardless of what the committee's attitude on the bill may be. The point I make is that the committees with which I am familiar—the working committees, that is—do have regular meeting days and do endeavor to keep their calendars clear.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in response to the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, that I said at the inception of my remarks that I made no defense of the Finance Committee, because I thought it had been negligent in some matters. The instance to which the Senator refers seems to have been exceptional. For example, during all the years I have been on the Finance Committee I know of no effort which has been made to discharge it from the consideration of a particular measure because of lack of attention to it, unless it be the case to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers. As to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, however, of which I am chairman, I can speak with more authority. I know of no bill having been introduced by any Senator or any bill that has come from the other House which has been sent to that committee that has failed to receive consideration upon the request either of the author or of any member of the committee.

I confess, as I think the chairman of every other committee will confess, that there are usually a great many bills on the calendar of the committee in which there is no great interest and as to which there is no demand or request for consideration. It is perfectly obvious to every member of an active committee that it is not expected to take up each bill and give it careful consideration unless the author of the bill so requests or unless there is some public interest which demands that action should be taken. There is no use trying to disguise the situation. We all know that that is the general practice. When Senators are not sufficiently interested in their own bills to urge consideration by the committees to which they are referred, it can hardly be expected that the committees, with the voluminous number of bills before them, will take them up and give them consideration.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire of the Senator from Michigan as to the status of the bill prohibiting lottery advertisements over the radio?

Mr. COUZENS. I will be very glad to tell the Senator as to that. I called a meeting of the committee for 10 o'clock this morning to consider that measure; the committee room has been open all morning in an effort to get a quorum, but without success. The bill was passed by the House of Representatives, came to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and was promptly taken up. The committee made numerous amendments, one of them to insert in the bill a fee system providing that broadcasting stations, according to power, should pay a license fee, and also that there should be fees for operators and for amateur stations and for others engaged in the radio broadcasting or receiving business. Then the committee amended the lottery provision as it passed the House in some respects, the details of which I do not at the moment recall, and also made some amendments with respect to political advertising. The committee then authorized the chairman to report the bill to the Senate, and the bill was reported to the Senate. Afterwards there was a great protest—and I think properly so—that the committee had acted in fixing the license fees without any hearings being held as to the fairness of the fees proposed. After considerable complaint with respect to that matter, the chairman, on his own authority, recalled the bill to the committee. The bill came back to the committee and is now before it. On several occasions the chairman has called meetings for the purpose of taking up that bill and removing the controversial questions and reporting it back to the Senate but has been unable to secure a quorum to do so.

Mr. GLASS. Of course the Senator understands that in my inquiry there was no implication of neglect.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand that.

Mr. GLASS. I merely wanted to know the status of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the status of the bill; and I feel very badly that action has not been taken at this session, but I want to disclaim any responsibility. The cause for nonaction has been due to the rush and the early morning meetings of the Senate and inability to secure a quorum to enable the committee to act.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, whenever anyone discusses the creation of a new committee to deal with legislation affecting veterans' affairs or the transfer of such legislation to a committee which obviously ought to deal with it, the members of the present subcommittee of the Finance Committee take it as a personal reflection on their efforts. There is no such suggestion in my mind or in the minds of others who think that all the different problems affecting veterans' legislation ought to be handled by the same committee, as is done in the House of Representatives.

On Monday I offered some figures presented to me by officials of the American Legion with regard to the disposition which the subcommittee of the Finance Committee has made of the 168 veterans' bills which have come before it. This letter was written on May 23. As the Senator from Pennsylvania correctly pointed out, two more bills have been referred to the committee since that time; so that the record now is that 170 veterans' bills have been referred to the subcommittee of the Finance Committee. In every other respect the figures which I presented to the Senate on Monday are entirely correct.

The Senator from Wisconsin has just presented the legislative calendar of the Finance Committee for publication in the RECORD, which will show the accuracy of the statement which I made on Monday.

Mr. President, it is quite true, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has stated, that many of these bills are what might be called private bills in which the Senate as a whole has no great interest, and which could be referred to subcommittees and disposed of promptly; but I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all the bills before that subcommittee are not in that class by any means.

I find here, for instance, S. 623 introduced on December 9 by Mr. MCKELLAR, providing for the payment by the Government of attorneys' fees in certain suits growing out of governmental insurance policies issued to service men or ex-service men, reported adversely.

On December 14 the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] introduced S. 1603, to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended. This bill was reported adversely on February 25, 1932.

On December 17 the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] introduced S. 2185, which was referred to the Finance Committee, to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended. It was reported adversely on February 25.

On December 17, 1931, Mr. SHORTRIDGE introduced S. 2186, to amend section 200 of the World War veterans' act, as amended. This was reported adversely on March 7, and recommitted on April 29.

On February 4, 1932, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced S. 3500, to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended. This was reported adversely on April 19.

On February 16 the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] introduced S. 3666, to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended. It was tabled indefinitely on March 24.

On the same date Mr. BYRNES also introduced S. 3667, to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended. This was tabled indefinitely on March 24.

On May 12 Mr. WALSH of Montana introduced S. 4640, to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended. No action has been taken on that bill.

On May 16 Mr. MORRISON introduced S. 4666, relating to the rate of interest on loans to veterans under the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended. No action has been taken on that bill.

On June 8 Mr. MCGILL introduced S. 4845, to amend section 301 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended by act approved June 2, 1926. No action has been taken on that bill.

Mr. President, not one of the bills I have just read is what could, by any stress of the imagination, be called a private bill. Every one of them deals with a subject of general interest to the ex-service men. Under those circumstances it is perfectly inexcusable that during this session no hearing has been held by the Finance Committee, or by any subcommittee thereof, before which representatives of the American Legion or other ex-service men's organizations have been allowed to appear.

Ever since I have been a Member of the Senate the veterans' organizations have urged the appointment of a standing committee to handle veterans' affairs. As has been shown by the votes in the last few days, an overwhelming majority of the Senate is in favor of taking up this subject and of voting on it. We have had no opposition to it except from those who are responsible for denying by the ex-service men's organizations hearings on the legislation which they consider essential.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] at the beginning of this session introduced Senate Resolution 26, which has been under discussion. It was referred to the Committee on Rules. No action was taken by that committee.

On April 21, on motion of the Senator from Iowa, the Committee on Rules was discharged, and this bill was placed on the calendar. From that date until the present there has been an attempt to bring up this bill at every morning session, and each time some technical objection has been raised or it has been defeated by a filibuster.

To say that a committee which deals with the basic financial problems of the country, with the tariff and taxation, has had no time at this session to consider the grave problems concerned with veterans' legislation is not a reflection on the membership of the committee. The only criticism which I make of the attitude of the committee is that I can not conceive why they should insist on taking over so much extra work which does not in any way come within their province. The only explanation I have found is the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on Monday, in answer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], when the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

> We are now spending about $1,000,000,000—a thousand million dollars—a year for veterans' relief. We have given more generously to our veterans than any nation in the world ever did at any time in history. That takes 25 per cent of the entire National Budget of the Federal Treasury. Ought it not to be the Finance Committee, which has to plan for raising that money by taxation, that has charge of these bills for pouring out the money to the veterans?

If that is an argument, Mr. President, then, of course, the legislation which comes before the Military Affairs Committee, the Naval Affairs Committee, the Post Office Committee, and many of the standing committees of the Senate should on the same grounds be referred to the Finance Committee. In fact, to carry the argument one step farther, we should abolish our Appropriations Committee altogether, and have all these questions referred to the Finance Committee. That is not a system which has commended itself to the Congress in the past or one which is likely to commend itself in the future.

The facts are perfectly plain that at this session, out of 170 veterans' bills which have been referred to the Finance Committee, just 6 have been reported favorably. I am going to take a moment to set forth what these six particular bills were.

The first one was S. 695, introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The title of the bill was, "A bill authorizing additional hospital and domiciliary facilities for veterans of all wars." The substance of the bill was entirely different from the title. The substance of the bill was a pay cut in hospital allowances for disabled veterans. It was a proposal which has been voted down repeatedly on the floor of the Senate.

The bill was reported out by the Senator from Utah without any action by the committee, and after considerable pressure by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] it was recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The second bill reported favorably was the insurance deposition bill, S. 929. I think Senators will remember the determined fight which was put up in this Chamber by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] before it was possible to obtain a favorable report on that bill. The Senator from Nebraska fought for this measure for several months. After it came up on the floor it had to be debated at great length. It was a bill to which there could be no legitimate opposition; and it ought not to have required any lengthy discussion, either in the committee or on the floor of the Senate.

The third bill reported favorably was S. 1251, giving adjusted-compensation certificates a loan value from date of issue. This was a bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. It was referred to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. The bill was reported to the Senate Calendar on March 29, 1932, after the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] had threatened to move the discharge of the committee from further consideration of that legislation. After reaching the floor of the Senate it was objected to on April 11 by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], the member of the Finance Committee to whom it had been referred as a subcommittee.

The other bills are of minor importance. One is S. 2955, to apportion retirement pay for dependents, a bill which passed the Senate on March 10; S. 3543, a private bill reported favorably to the Senate and afterwards passed; and S. 3886, a bill of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to allow the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to expend funds for tobacco. This bill passed the Senate on April 11.

That is the complete record up to date of the Finance Committee of the Senate on veterans' legislation during this session of Congress.

I think this brief analysis will convince any Member of the Senate who studies it of the necessity for the creation of a new committee to deal with veterans' affairs.

Of course, the members of the Finance Committee have been busy. It is just because they have been necessarily busy with other matters that they have not been able to give this legislation the time which it needs. But that, Mr. President, is no reason why the Senate of the United States should continue to deal with the problems of veterans' legislation in any such fashion as it has done in the past.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] talked at some length this morning about the widows and orphans' bill, a bill which passed the House more than a month ago and has been buried in the Senate committee. The Senator from Pennsylvania may, of course, be right, and the overwhelming majority of the Senate membership may be wrong. There is no getting away from that possibility; but, regardless of whether the Senator from Pennsylvania is right or wrong on the merits of that or any other particular piece of legislation, the fact remains that those who have studied the problem of the veteran ought to have been at least granted a hearing; that the bill should have come before the Senate with a report, favorable or adverse as the case may be; and that the Senate should have been given a chance to vote on it.

I entirely agree with what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said just now. Committees are not places in which to chloroform bills which members of the committee dislike. Sooner or later the Senate has a right to express its opinion on legislation of this character, or legislation of any other important character. That is why the veterans of the United States insist on a committee which shall at least give them a hearing, which shall at least allow them to place their point of view before the committee and, through the committee, before the membership of the Senate.

I can say, for my own part, that I intend to do everything in my power to press for a vote on the Brookhart resolution before the close of the present session of Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3847) to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. CONNERY, Mr. GREEN, Mr. RAMSPECK, Mr. WELCH, and Mr. KOPP were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

METROPOLITAN WATER DISTRICT OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have waited during the morning hour in the hope that an unobjected bill that has been passed by the House and which has been recommended by the department might be reached and passed, because it is important that it should be passed. It proposes to grant a right of way to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California to enable them to construct a new aqueduct, for which they have voted $220,000,000 in bonds. The bill was written by the department; it has been approved by the department; it has passed the House; and the Senate committee has unanimously reported it to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered and acted upon at this time. The bill to which I refer is Order of Business 856, being House bill 10048.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWELL. I inquire of the Senator from California if the consideration of the bill will lead to any discussion?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think it will lead to any discussion. If so, I will withdraw the request.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 10048) granting to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California certain public and reserved lands of the United States in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, and San Bernardino, in the State of California, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the reservation, until their disposition is hereafter expressly directed by law, of all minerals except earth, stone, sand, gravel, and other materials of like character, there is hereby granted to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, a public corporation of the State of California, all lands belonging to the United States, situate in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, and San Bernardino, in the State of California, including trust or restricted Indian allotments in any Indian reservation or lands reserved for any purpose in connection with the Indian Service, which have not been conveyed to any allottee with full power of alienation, which may be necessary, as found by the Secretary of the Interior, for any or all of the following purposes: Rights of way; buildings and structures; construction and maintenance camps; dumping grounds; flowage; diverting or storage dams; pumping plants; power plants; canals, ditches, pipes, and pipe lines; flumes, tunnels, and conduits for conveying water for domestic, irrigation, power, and other useful purposes; poles, towers, and lines for the conveyance and distribution of electrical energy; poles and lines for telephone and telegraph purposes; roads, trails, bridges, tramways, railroads, and other means of locomotion, transmission, or communication; for obtaining stone, earth, gravel, and other materials of like character; or any other necessary purposes of said district, together with the right to take for its own use, free of cost, from any public lands, within such limits as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, stone, earth, gravel, sand, and other materials of like character necessary or useful in the construction, operation, and maintenance of aqueducts, reservoirs, dams, pumping plants, electric plants, and transmission, telephone, and telegraph lines, roads, trails, bridges, tramways, railroads, and other means of locomotion, transmission, and communication, or any other necessary purposes of said district. This grant shall be effective upon (1) the filing by said grantee at any time after the passage of this act, with the register of the United States local land office in the district where said lands are situated, of a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said lands and of said rights of way for the purposes hereinabove set forth; (2) the approval of such map or maps by the Secretary of the Interior, with such reservations or modifications as he may deem appropriate; (3) the payment of $1.25 per acre for all Government lands conveyed under this act other than for the right of way for the aqueduct; and (4) for all lands conveyed in Indian reservations or in Indian allotments which have not been conveyed to the allottee with full power of alienation, the district shall pay for the benefit of the Indians such just compensation as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That said lands for rights of way shall be along such locations and of such width, not to exceed 250 feet, as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior may be required for the purposes of this act: And provided further, That said lands for any of said purposes other than for rights of way for the aqueduct may be of such width or extent as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior as necessary for such purposes.

SEC. 2. Whenever the lands or the rights of way are the same as are designated on any map heretofore filed by said district or by the city of Los Angeles in connection with any application for a right of way under any statute of the United States, which said application is still pending, or has been granted, and is unrevoked and has been transferred to and is now owned by said district, then upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of any such later map with such modifications and under such conditions as he may deem appropriate the rights hereby granted shall, as to such lands or rights of way, become effective as of the date of the filing of said earlier map or maps with the register of the United States local land office.

SEC. 3. If any of the lands to which the said district seeks to acquire title under sections 1 and 2 of this act are in a national forest, the said map or maps shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture so far as national-forest lands are affected; and upon such approval and the subsequent approval by the Secretary of the Interior, title to said lands shall vest in the grantee upon the date of such subsequent approval.

SEC. 4. Said grants are to be made subject to the rights of all claimants or persons who shall have filed or made valid claims, locations, or entries on or to said labels, or any part thereof, prior to the effective date of any conflicting grant hereunder, unless prior to such effective date proper relinquishments or quitclaims have been procured and caused to be filed in the proper land office.

SEC. 5. On the cessation of use of the land granted for the purposes of the grant the estate of the grantee or of its assigns shall terminate and revest in the United States.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1928.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the amendment is to strike out part of lines 11 and 12, on page 18, the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board." The entire sentence reads:

The remaining, or surplus portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of as directed by the Federal Farm Board, except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market.

The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would have but little bearing on the paragraph, as I see it, but I can see no objection to the part the Senator moves to strike out remaining in the bill. The farmer who does not want to dispose of the surplus by export has the privilege of withholding it from the market by keeping it on the farm, or, if he wants to, disposing of it through other methods which might be prescribed by the Federal Farm Board. Inasmuch as the Federal Farm Board is the organization on which this bill confers the power of carrying out the provisions of the measure, I believe the amendment should be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Sheppard
Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Shortridge
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Smoot
Blaine	Dill	Kendrick	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Fletcher	King	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Frazier	McGill	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	McKellar	Trammell
Byrnes	Glenn	McNary	Vandenberg
Capper	Goldsborough	Moses	Wagner
Caraway	Gore	Neely	Walcott
Carey	Hale	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Harrison	Norris	Watson
Connally	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	White
Costigan	Howell	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], which the Secretary will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, lines 11 and 12, the Senator from Wisconsin moves to strike out the words "as directed by the Federal Farm Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, on yesterday an amendment I offered, on page 18, line 13, was adopted, to strike out the period after the word "market" and insert the words "unless perishable, and farm products subject to processing and preserving." I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, line 13, after the word "market," the Senator from Wisconsin moves to insert a colon and the words "Provided, That the surplus of perishable commodities, livestock, and poultry, and the products thereof may be sold in the domestic market."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator just what commodities would be embraced within the terminology of the amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. All fruits and vegetables and perishables.

Mr. KING. Would that include meats?

Mr. BLAINE. I have included cattle and their products, which includes meats; poultry and its products, which includes eggs; and dairy-cattle products, which includes butter and milk and all the products of dairy cows. In other words, this would permit the sale in the western market of the surpluses of all perishable commodities and all meat products and products of animals.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator another question? Would it permit, as an illustration, the sale of the dairy products produced in the Senator's State, or in Minnesota, or in Maine, to Canadians, just across the line?

Mr. BLAINE. It would permit the sale to Canadians and permit of the sale of the surplus within the United States in any State from any State.

Mr. KING. As I understood the amendment as it was read, it limited the sale of these surplus commodities to continental United States.

Mr. BLAINE. No. The Senator will observe that the language I am proposing to amend is, "except that it shall not be disposed of in the domestic market." I make the exception that all these commodities may be sold in the domestic market.

Mr. KING. That is the point I make. May they be sold outside of the domestic market—in Canada or Mexico, for instance?

Mr. BLAINE. Earlier provisions in the same paragraph provide for sale in the foreign market—the export market. That is provided for.

Mr. KING. The effect of the Senator's amendment—and I hope I will be pardoned for repetition—will be to withdraw from the operation of Title III of this bill all perishable commodities, including fruits and vegetables and dairy products and meat products.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment would accomplish this purpose; it would permit the sale of all products the Senator has mentioned in the domestic market, which the bill, as it stands, prohibits.

Mr. KING. What jurisdiction would the Farm Board have over the commodities?

Mr. BLAINE. No jurisdiction, because the language which would have given the Farm Board jurisdiction has been stricken out.

Mr. KING. Then a person would not need to have a license in order to buy or to sell the commodities to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. BLAINE. Not perishables and the other products enumerated.

Mr. KING. They comprise everything, so far as I can understand, except cotton, and perhaps rice and wheat, and possibly some other cereals, although I am not sure.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the amendment includes all of those commodities which must be sold within a reasonable time after they are harvested or produced in order to save their value. The purpose is to permit the sale of those commodities anywhere.

Mr. KING. I am not quite sure as to the implications of the amendment; but any amendment which the Senator has suggested, and many more which might be suggested, would greatly improve Title III; indeed, the bill would be greatly improved if Title III were eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the Chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin. As I understand it, his amendment adopted a moment ago provided that the words in line 11, page 18, "as directed by the Federal Farm Board," should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. In the event that language is stricken from the bill, it seems to me that something would have to take its place, because upon some body must devolve the responsibility of deciding these questions; and when that language is stricken out, without something being substituted in its place, it seems to me the paragraph is made practically without any effect.

Mr. BLAINE. No, Mr. President. I am opposed to permitting any public authority to determine what shall be done with the surplus of a farm commodity. That must be left to the cooperatives and to the individual farmers. This is substantive law as it now stands. The cooperatives and the individual farmers will have the freedom of selling in the export market or withholding from the market or, if the amendment is adopted, selling a surplus of perishable commodities and those commodities which must be sold very shortly after their production in order to save the value, provided that the same may be sold in the domestic market.

Mr. WHEELER. The section would read:

> The remaining, or surplus portion, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of.

Is it the Senator's idea that no one should have any power in any direction to say whether or not it should be sold or withheld?

Mr. BLAINE. My conviction is that there should be no public authority having power to determine what may be done with the surplus products.

Mr. WHEELER. The trouble with the matter is that if we do not have some responsible authority to make the statement as to whether there is a surplus we are going to have a lot of different organizations who are not going to know. It seems to me that by striking out that provision without substituting some authority in its place and giving some one the power and authority, the Senator is absolutely nullifying the effect of the whole provision.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator had been in the Chamber yesterday when I discussed that amendment—I do not now remember whether he was or not——

Mr. WHEELER. No; I was unable to be present.

Mr. BLAINE. He would not be raising the question he is raising this morning. I pointed out clearly that no public authority should have the right to tell a farmer that he must destroy every third row of cotton or dispose of every tenth dairy cow or destroy his milk or destroy his fruit or any other commodity. I am unwilling to place in the hands of public authorities the right to compel a farmer to destroy any portion of his crop, of whatever character it may be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to move to amend by striking from the bill section 14, on pages 18 and 19 and down to and including line 7, page 20.

Mr. President, this motion is designed to eliminate from the bill—with a few changes which will have to be made later owing to some references in other parts of the bill to this portion of the bill—what is known as the allotment plan.

There are those who think the allotment plan would prove the most effective method for aiding agriculture. I am not committing myself at this time against the plan. If an allotment plan can be worked out which would seem to be in the interest of agriculture, I shall hold myself free to support it. But I am very clear that as these provisions come to us they are unworkable, and I am equally clear that they are in direct conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. I do not think we do our duty to the farmer by passing an unworkable and unconstitutional law.

If there were any doubt with reference to the constitutionality of the bill, I think the argument that the matter should go to the Supreme Court would be a sound argument; but I do not think there is any doubt about it. I think it is so manifestly true that the President would be compelled to take cognizance of it in considering the signing of the bill or in a veto of the bill, and we would have no opportunity to sustain ourselves in the courts. Therefore I move to strike out the provision known as the allotment provision with the view that we may more thoroughly deal with it in the future. By greater study we may be able to save the principle under which the plan is based.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Idaho whether all the provisions of section 15, found on pages 20, 21, and 22, are essential to be retained or may not they, or at least some of them, be excised?

Mr. BORAH. Some of them will have to be removed, but it will be noted that in section 15, Title I, Title II, and Title III are mentioned. We would not want to strike out all of those because there are references there to Title I and Title II. By another motion we can strike out that portion of it which relates to Title III.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, briefly I desire to sum up the proposition generally:

The amendments I have offered remove the objection respecting the lack of power of the Congress to regulate intrastate commerce, or commerce within a State. It seems, therefore, that the only constitutional objection that may be lodged against the provisions as they now stand is the objection to that provision requiring the purchaser of the commodities to purchase them at a price less than that fixed by the Federal Farm Board. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has suggested, the provision which would compel a purchaser to pay a price not less than the price fixed by the Federal Farm Board would not be sustained by our courts.

There are valuable provisions in the allotment plan as it now stands, viz, the provision requiring the Federal Farm Board to ascertain and make public the part of domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption, and to ascertain the cost of production of farm commodities. Those two provisions are, of course, constitutional. There is no doubt that Congress has the power to direct the Federal Farm Board to ascertain the cost of production of farm commodities and to make public the facts which they may find respecting the cost of production, and also to make public, after ascertainment, the facts as to the part of domestic production of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he does not think that the Department of Agriculture is already equipped and qualified to obtain the data referred to through the various agencies which it has in every part of the United States? Would it not be sufficient to direct that department to procure the information desired?

Mr. BLAINE. The Department of Agriculture now, if given authority, could carry out what is proposed by the first provision of section 14 of the bill; but I am not disposed to quibble over the proposition whether it should be the Department of Agriculture or the Federal Farm Board. At any time the Congress may direct that the Department of Agriculture shall carry out the directions which are proposed to be given to the Federal Farm Board, and eliminate the Federal Farm Board from the provisions of the law. But I am not concerned with whether it is the Federal Farm Board or the Department of Agriculture that may have imposed upon it the duty to ascertain the cost of production of farm products and to make public the part of domestic production of agricultural products which is needed for domestic consumption. That would be valuable information and all that would be a valid enactment if Congress passes the bill.

I do not want to lead any farmer to believe that Congress can fix the price of farm commodities or any other commodities in any attempt to regulate interstate commerce. Of course, there are those who contend that Congress has the power to regulate rates that may be charged by railroads. That is an entirely different proposition. The power of Congress in that case rests upon other fundamentals of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I do not want to hold out to the farmers of this country that Congress can fix the price of farm products. To do so would only leave the farmers later on to find that they had been betrayed. There is no doubt in my mind that Congress can not go into any price-fixing arrangement under the cloak of exercising the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

If Congress has the power to fix prices, this may be a good time to determine that question; but I doubt very much if the Federal Farm Board would ever attempt to exercise such power. I do not contend that the Federal Farm Board would have such power, and the attempt to confer it upon the Federal Farm Board would result in a nullity; in other words, there would be no law to that effect.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield when I finish this statement. We would have left, however, the very substantial provision requiring the Federal Farm Board to ascertain the cost of production of farm commodities, and I think that would mean all farm commodities, notwithstanding the amendments. That is a substantial provision.

There is also the provision requiring the Farm Board to ascertain and make public the portion of domestic production in any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption. Those are two substantial provisions, and, of course, would be valid enactments if Congress should see fit to make them, and would be valuable in advising the country as to the actual cost of production of products on the farm, in which, of course, all the people of the United States are very deeply interested.

At the present time there is no official information of a character that can be depended upon as to the cost of production of agricultural products. I assume that if that provision of the bill should be adopted the Federal Farm Board would set up rules respecting the factors that go into the cost of production. I assume they would include a reasonable rate of return upon the capital investment of the farmer, then the actual operating expenses of the farmer; and I assume that one of the factors would be the labor performed not only by the individual farmer himself but as well by his wife and his children. Usually upon farms the farm is operated by the entire family, all of them participating in the production of farm commodities. So I assume that those items would be factors in ascertaining the cost of production.

In the case of farms that are encumbered, I assume that the average rate of interest upon the mortgages would be taken into account in ascertaining the interest charge that is levied upon agriculture. I also assume that another factor would be the amount of taxes that are paid by agriculture. All of those factors—and I have not enumerated all factors that will enter into the question of the cost of production—would be taken into consideration by the Federal Farm Board in ascertaining the facts as to the cost of production.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I think there is a great deal in what the Senator says about the desire to have some ascertainment, if practicable, of the cost of production of farm products, but I certainly do not want the Federal Farm Board to make that ascertainment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Federal Farm Board may not be the best equipped agency to make the ascertainment for the Government; I have no prejudices in the matter. I think as much of the Federal Farm Board as I do of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. That is not very much.

Mr. BLAINE. In fact, my affections—and I have very deep consideration for all public officials—I think will balance as between the two departments. I am not speaking in a personal way of those departments nor of their respective personnels. Probably officially the Federal Farm Board is as well equipped and is as competent to ascertain the facts about which I have been speaking as is the Department of Agriculture; but I have no concern as to which department may ascertain those facts.

Mr. President, I do not want to continue the debate further, except to emphasize that, with the outline I have given, as I understand the provisions of Title III, after the adoption of the amendments which I proposed, the Congress has not the power under the guise of regulating interstate commerce to fix prices, and that if such power is conferred by the bill it is a nullity.

I do not want to represent to the agricultural interests of this country that Congress has any power to fix prices under the guise of the regulation of interstate commerce. However, I am perfectly willing to vote that the power respecting the ascertainment of the cost of production shall be lodged in the Federal Farm Board, and I think that the cost of production of farm products should be ascertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is discouraging to try to present any proposition with only some 10 Members of the Senate on the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, would the Senator like to have a quorum called?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No, Mr. President. I know that the Senator would suggest the absence of a quorum but let me suggest to the distinguished Senator that if that should be done the Members would come from the radio where they are listening to the proceedings of a great national convention, they would come from their slumbers in the adjoining rooms; they would cease the telling of their stories for a moment; hide the butts of their cigars and cigarettes, and answer to the roll call, and then hie themselves back to the places whence they came. I do not desire to disturb their peaceful slumbers and other pleasant diversions at this time.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield for a question.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that the pending agricultural bill is of sufficient importance to disturb the slumbers of some Senators who have been sleeping on the job ever since they have been here so far as agriculture is concerned?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, and I find myself in a position where I must oppose the motion made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

I have just received a letter from the president of one of the three great organizations that are responsible for this bill being before the Senate and before the Congress. This bill is before this body because three great farm organizations have gotten together and asked the committee to report it favorably so that it may be considered. These three organizations are the Grange, the Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union.

This is the first bill, Mr. President, so far as I remember, in the support of which the three farm organizations have been in unison, and it occurs to me, inasmuch as the Congress has no plan for the relief of agriculture and inasmuch as the three farm organizations have submitted this plan, that we should at least give it every possible consideration and pass it and let it take its course with the courts.

It has been suggested here that the bill is unsound, uneconomic, unscientific, unconstitutional, and it has even been suggested that it is only a pleasant dream. Well, Mr. President, these reasons are urged against every bill to which Senators object; but if we had a bill pending before the Senate affecting money or affecting bonds, every seat would be filled and the leaders on each side of this aisle would be here watching the progress of the legislation in order that the interests those bills were intended to serve might be protected.

The letter to which I refer is signed by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union and is addressed to myself. I read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 15, 1932.

Hon. ELMER THOMAS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have presented the allotment plan contained in the McNary bill to more than 200 farm audiences ranging from a few hundred to a good many thousands and covering 21 States. I have presented the bill to chambers of commerce and other civic organizations. I presented it to the State board of agriculture in our State in one of their meetings. In all these presentations the plan was indorsed, and not one person in the multiplied thousands got such misunderstanding of the provisions of the bill as many Members of the Senate seem to have.

The bill is so simple that if I had not been present and heard the remarks of Senators I would not have believed it possible for any man to get such conception of the bill.

The bill provides, first, for getting cost of production for that portion of farm crops used in domestic consumption.

Second. It provides that the remaining portion will take the world market at the time and place of any delivery by the producer.

Third. The Government deals only with the purchaser, and does this through a license control system.

Fourth. The licensee settles for each delivery by the producer on a basis of paying the Government fixed price for the portion needed for home consumption (which price is the same during the crop year) and the world price for the remainder at that place on that day.

Fifth. There is no regulation of the farmer in this bill.

Sixth. There is no expense to the Government except administration. The Government did this very thing for wheat of the 1919 crop at a very small expense.

Farmers for wheat and cotton are not getting more than one-fourth cost of production. They are getting less than cost for every product they sell. If it is right for the home folks to pay the farmer's cost for that portion of the crop the home folks use, then this bill is right.

Under present marketing conditions the farmer has nothing to say about the prices of his products. Speculators on the exchanges name the prices. This bill takes that authority away from the speculator in the portion used in home consumption. Senators, in the name of humanity, in the name of the general welfare of this Nation, rescue us from the price fixing of our products by the speculators on the exchanges.

I suggest that if any amendments to the bill would make it read more clearly, as I have outlined above, that you offer such amendments.

Yours truly,

JOHN A. SIMPSON,
President National Farmers' Union.

During the reading of the letter—

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat who is the author of the letter?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The letter is addressed to myself, and signed by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, and is dated June 15, 1932.

After the conclusion of the reading of the letter—

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it has been charged upon the floor of the Senate that this bill is not perfect. I should like to ask the Senate what bill in its inception is ever found to be perfect. After years of investigation, the Banking and Currency Committees of the respective Houses finally brought out what is known as the Federal reserve act. That act was passed in 1916, if I remember correctly, and from 1916 until the present time the Federal reserve act has been amended no less than 25 separate times, and even now there is pending before this body a measure proposing a complete overhauling of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I just want to observe that the Federal reserve act gives the bankers the privilege of setting the interest rates, the exchange rates, and the value of money itself.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. FRAZIER. And yet do we see Congress doing anything to set the price of farm products?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. During the last few moments we have heard discussion here complaining about some governmental tribunal having the power to fix prices. The Constitution provides that the Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. The Congress has delegated that power to the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Reserve Board has so handled the finances that to-day the value of a dollar, measured in farm commodities, is $2.03; and measured by a wholesale list of commodities, the dollar to-day is worth $1.53.

It is contended that there is no constitutional authority for delegating to any board the power to fix prices. Well, Mr. President, let me reason just a moment on that proposition.

If this bill should be passed, the Federal Farm Board would have the power to find and announce the cost of production of farm commodities. That would be done by making computations over a wide range of elements—a computation of the investment in the first instance, a computation of the cost of seed, a computation of the cost of labor, a computation of the cost of harvesting, and the cost of delivering these commodities to the market. Those items would make up the cost of production. Has not the Congress the power to delegate power to some department or agency to ascertain and announce the cost of producing farm commodities?

The Constitution, in the preamble, provides that the entire document is called into existence for the benefit of the general welfare. For the general welfare we must have food. In order to have food, the food must be produced. Some one must produce this food. Under our system we call the men and women who produce food farmers. In order for these farmers to produce the food, and do it over a period of years, they must at least get the cost of production. If they do not get cost it is only a question of time until their surplus, their equities, will have been exhausted, and they will cease to be farmers and cease to have the ability to produce food; and in that eventuality the general welfare would be injured, if not entirely destroyed.

So, reasoning by analogy, it is my contention that under the general-welfare clause Congress has the power to fix the price of farm commodities at least at the cost of production, and that is only a living wage for the things that the farmers produce.

As I said in the beginning, this bill is here because of the activities of three great farm organizations. It is the first time that these three farm organizations have been able to agree upon a specific piece of legislation. The Congress itself has no plan to help the farmers.

At this point I call attention to my colleagues on this side of the aisle to what the Democrats of the Nation had to say in their platform adopted at Houston only four short years ago. I read from the Democratic platform under the title "Agriculture," as follows:

Virulent hostility of the Republican administration to the advocates of farm relief and denial of the right of farm organizations to lead in the development of farm policy must yield to Democratic sympathy and friendliness.

Mr. President, my colleagues, having no plan of their own, when the farm organizations come here and present a plan are absent, and those who speak are almost uniformly against the plan.

I read again from the Democratic platform, speaking about the President now:

While he has had no constructive and adequate program to offer in its stead, he has twice vetoed farm-relief legislation and has sought to justify his disapproval of agricultural legislation partly on grounds wholly inconsistent with his acts making industrial monopolies the beneficiaries of Government favor.

Again I read:

Producers of crops whose total volume exceeds the needs of the domestic market must continue at a disadvantage until the Government shall intervene as seriously and as effectively in behalf of the farmer as it has intervened in behalf of labor and industry. There is a need of supplemental legislation for the control and orderly handling of agricultural surpluses, in order that the price of the surplus may not determine the price of the whole crop. Labor has benefited by collective bargaining and some industries by tariff. Agriculture must be as effectively aided.

The Democratic Party in its 1924 platform pledged its support to such legislation. It now reaffirms that stand and pledges the united efforts of the legislative and executive branches of Government, as far as may be controlled by the party, to the immediate enactment of such legislation and such other steps as are necessary to place and maintain the purchasing power of farm products and the complete economic equality of agriculture.

Mr. President, this bill conforms 100 per cent to the principles thus laid down; and yet when the bill is brought here, complying with the platform adopted by my party, I find the leaders on my side opposing the legislation! If they were present, I would pause to ask them what they had to offer in its stead.

No doubt the Chicago Republican Convention now in session will adopt some program with regard to farm relief, and the only plan or program they have, so far as I know, is this identical bill.

When the Democratic convention meets in Chicago a few days hence, unless something new is developed between this time and that, this will be the only bill before that convention; and if the convention choose to adopt any declaration in behalf of the farmer, they are limited to the principles of this bill, and the principle is the cost of production. Any Senator who opposes this bill stands before the country in opposition to the farmer receiving the cost of production for the things that he raises to sell, to pay his taxes or pay his interest, and to support himself and his family.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the motion submitted by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I sincerely trust that same will not prevail.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I spoke at some length upon this bill at the time it was approved by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I do not care to traverse the ground I covered at that time. However, I will make a few observations in reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He may be right in his claim that this allotment plan is unconstitutional, and he may be wrong, because nobody knows about these constitutional questions until the Supreme Court has had the last guess on them. Since the Supreme Court has assumed that power, I have ceased to worry about the constitutionality of these things to any great extent myself. I pass that responsibility on to them.

If this provision is constitutional, it is the most effective part of the bill, the only part of the bill which would give to agriculture its cost-of-production price.

Some time ago the great farm organizations agreed upon the basic idea that they should have such a legislative set-up, such funds, and such authority as to enable them to handle the exportable surplus of agriculture and give to the farmers a cost-of-production price, with a cooperative profit, at least on that portion of the production that is consumed in the domestic market.

Mr. President, I think that when the farm organizations came to the Congress with that proposition they had fulfilled their duty to their membership and to the farmers of the country. I think it was then the duty of the Congress to formulate the legislation which would carry out that policy.

Pursuing that idea, I myself drafted a farm bill, which was based largely upon the old original Norris-Sinclair bill. It maintained the equalization-fee proposition of the McNary-Haugen bill and the debenture proposition that was passed by the United States Senate; however, in a modified form.

It was impossible to get the committee to really consider the bill. I went before the House committee and presented it quite fully there, but it seemed to be impossible to get a report on it from that committee. Finally, as I deemed it, neglecting the duty of legislators, the members of the committee put the matter up to the farm organizations to formulate a measure and come in with a detailed bill. The farm organizations, not being experts as legislators, not being lawyers, have formulated and presented this 3-way bill.

Mr. President, this bill may be filled with defects; in fact, I think it is. I pointed them out in my discussion before. But, under the present circumstances, I am willing to try it and see what it will produce.

I would be glad to see a revolving fund provided in sufficient amount to handle the entire exportable surplus of the staple agricultural products. I think that is absolutely necessary in order to give the farmers the cost of production which they have figured out and demanded.

In handling this surplus with a revolving fund, there may be some losses in the disposal of it in the world market; and, of course, finally that surplus will have to be sold in some world market.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. How much of a revolving fund would be needed to carry on this marketing program?

Mr. BROOKHART. The chairman of the Farm Board testified in committee hearings that a billion dollars, in addition to the amount already provided, would be sufficient to handle the entire exportable surplus of the big staple crops.

Mr. DAVIS. That means an appropriation by the Government of a billion dollars to provide a revolving fund?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. Would it be repaid to the Government?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. We will keep that intact. We will provide some method of making up the losses, either through the debenture or the equalization fee, and the losses to the Government of course would come through debenture payments, and not through the establishment of a revolving fund.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand it, under this 3-way program of farm relief, the Federal Farm Board can adopt any one of the three ways.

Mr. BROOKHART. Any one of the three; but in this bill the extra billion dollars of revolving fund, which I think necessary, is not provided. I think that will drive the Farm Board to the necessity of putting on both the equalization fee and the debenture. The debenture that is provided in this bill is about one-fourth enough to protect a cost-of-production price, and I think not more than that.

At the time the debenture was first offered prices were much higher than they are now, and it would come nearer, of course, protecting the cost-of-production price than it would starting with the low level of present prices.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am interested in a statement made by the Senator a moment ago, and I do not want to misunderstand the able Senator from Iowa. The statement I referred to was, as I understood the Senator, that the Government might sustain losses in the operation of this measure. I was wondering whether the Senator contemplated losses which the Government would have to pay if the equalization-fee features of the bill were accepted and put into effect.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the equalization-fee proposition works, there will be no losses for the Government to pay, because the equalization fee is a euphonious name for a tax on farmers.

Mr. KING. Suppose it does not work and the equalization fee is wholly inadequate to meet the losses sustained. Would resort then be had to the Treasury of the United States to meet those losses?

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the debenture proposition resort would be had to the Treasury in the amount of the debenture, as provided in this bill, if they adopted that plan along with the equalization fee. That would limit the Government liability under this bill.

Mr. KING. I am not speaking of the debenture, for the moment.

Mr. BROOKHART. There are no other liabilities provided in this bill upon the Government except the debenture.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to invite his attention—and I am doing it for information—to page 6, under Title I, lines 5 to 8, inclusive, which, with the permission of the Senator, I shall read:

> The United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, upon agreements under this title in respect of agricultural commodities, in excess of the amounts available in the stabilization, premium insurance, and revolving funds.

Do not those words contemplate that there is liability on the part of the Government which the Treasury of the United States would be compelled to meet?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the liability provided in the present farm marketing act. I think that creates no new liability under this act.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that the present farm marketing act does not provide for the equalization fee. It provides for a direct subsidy out of the Treasury of $500,000,000.

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, yes; but that is the law now. That is not this measure.

Mr. KING. I understand; but supplementing that law would come the equalization fee, and if I interpret these words aright there would be an obligation resting upon the Government which would be in addition to any obligations created by the farm marketing act.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I think the Senator has that turned around.

Mr. KING. I hope so.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the equalization fee would have a tendency to relieve the Farm Board of its present liability rather than to extend it.

Mr. KING. The Senator does admit that if the equalization-fee proposition were put into effect, and the other elements of this bill were eliminated, and there were losses, the Government would have to pay those losses?

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the old law; yes.

Mr. KING. Is there any authorization under the old law by which losses sustained under this equalization-fee provision should be met out of that $500,000,000 revolving fund?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator does not quite get the bearing of the proposition. Under the old law they can go ahead and perform all of those stabilization transactions, and there is no equalization fee to relieve the Government. This adds relief in the way of an equalization fee, and to that extent reduces the liability under the present law.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think this is supplemental legislation, and while perhaps there is an umbilical cord which should unite them, nevertheless the losses there would not be met out of the equalization fee, and the losses which would result from the operations under the equalization-fee provision would not be met out of the $500,000,000 revolving fund.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator still does not get the idea. Under the old law they could go ahead with the stabilizing operations and have the losses, just the same as they can under this measure, but under this measure they would have the equalization fee brought in to help cover those losses, so the Government liability would be reduced rather than increased, so far as the equalization fee is concerned.

Mr. KING. The Stabilization Corporation set up and the organization set up under the farm marketing act are not to be extinguished, or their liabilities are not to be diminished, by reason of anything that is carried in either of the provisions of this bill, and, I repeat, if the Senator will pardon me, this legislation is supplemental to that, merely multiplying the avenues for operation for the supposed relief of farmers, and at the same time entailing additional obligations upon the Government.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is a very remarkable provision under the old law, that the losses are to be covered by loans against future profits; but I count that just the same exactly as a loss. I do not reason it out any other way.

Mr. KING. With respect to that observation, I am in entire accord with the able Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. Under this measure the equalization fee will meet the losses which are now being sustained by the Federal Farm Board for similar operations.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is correct. That is the idea as I understand it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand it the law provides that an equalization fee, in an amount equivalent as nearly as may be, shall be collected upon the importation of any food product derived in whole or in part from an agricultural commodity imported into the United States for consumption therein. What revenue will that produce?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not know the amount of money it will produce. I have not checked that, but that is a part of the plan to place the burden on all food products whether imported or not.

Mr. DAVIS. That would probably absorb all the revenues from those customs duties from imported foodstuffs.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; that would add to the equalization fee, as I understand it. That is an equalization fee collected on imports, to which certainly no one would object.

Mr. DAVIS. In other words, the equalization fee collected on imports will go into a fund to be helpful to the farmers of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. It will be added to the equalization fee collected on domestic production.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. We know that the Government of the United States is liable for the $500,000,000 which has been appropriated for the Farm Board. Under the equalization-fee provision there is no limitation. We give a signed blank check to the Farm Board not only for the $500,000,000, which is largely wasted, but another signed blank check to meet any losses, no matter how great they may be, which will result from the operation of the equalization-fee program. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. BROOKHART. No. The Senator some way or other does not get the proposition ironed out right. Under the old law all the stabilization operations may be carried on, and if they have losses they pay them out of the revolving fund by loans against future profits, as I explained to the Senator. That is the law now. The pending proposition does not add to or take away from that in any particular. The board can go ahead with the same operations, but in addition to covering the losses with the loans against the future profits, the board now has the opportunity of levying the equalization-fee tax upon the farmers themselves in order to cover the losses. That is a positive relief from the present liability of the Farm Board and of the Government. The Senator can not reason that out in any other way.

Mr. President, the objection I have to the bill is that the farm organizations have been too modest. They have been afraid to ask for that to which they are justly entitled. I am fearful, because of the weakness of the bill, that it may not get the results they expect. It will take a tremendously heavy equalization fee at present prices to raise agricultural products up to the cost of production level. I do not know whether the farmers can stand that kind of a tax. They can on corn, perhaps, but not on wheat. The surplus is less than 1 per cent of corn and less than 1 per cent of oats and only 7 or 8 per cent of livestock products. Cotton, with a surplus of 50 per cent or more, would have a tremendous equalization-fee burden to carry. So I am fearful that because of the inadequacy of the bill it may not bring the desired result. If it does actually produce the cost of production and the farmers actually get that, then even on cotton they can well afford to pay the equalization fee, because for the other half of their cotton they will get as much higher price, and get just as good a price as for that on which they pay the fee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator explain to me the debenture plan?

Mr. BROOKHART. I will do the best I can. The debenture rates are certificates issued to exporters of those products. If the Senator is exporting corn, for instance, under this bill he is entitled to have a certificate of debenture from the Secretary of the Treasury at 7½ cents a bushel on all the corn he exports. Then he is entitled to have it redeemed, if nobody else will buy it, at 98 cents on the dollar out of the United States Treasury. There is no difference between the debenture, except in the mechanics of working it out, and a cash appropriation out of the Treasury, so far as the effect is concerned. It is the same with all the other rates. Seven and one-half cents is not enough to give us a cost-of-production price for corn at 23 cents, or at 20 cents a bushel as in my State at the present time. We need three or four times a 7½ cents debenture rate to do that.

It is thought that by issuing the debenture certificates—and I think it will work out—it will raise the price to the farmer by the amount of the debenture. I think that will work out all right in that way, although some claim that the debenture being issued to the exporter will not be passed to the benefit of the farmer; but they will not get the corn to export, because some other exporter would have as good a chance in a foreign market and he would be willing to raise the price in order to handle the business. I think the effect will reach the farmer all right.

In my opinion I think there is a much better way for handling the exportable surplus. I especially invite the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to this better way, because it is the Democratic method of handling it. The Democratic administration on the 4th of March, 1919, enacted a law for the handling of exportable surpluses which, I think, is the best idea and the best law that has ever been promulgated. That law appropriated $1,000,000,000 to handle wheat alone. When the Democrats were doing things themselves they did not hesitate to provide enough funds out of the Treasury to handle the situation. The reason they gave was that there should be no question about the ability of the Government to handle the entire exportable surplus of wheat. They not only provided

$1,000,000,000 for wheat alone, but they gave to the Farm Board or to the Wheat Corporation the right to borrow more money in the ordinary channels if they needed to do so, again furnishing a double guaranty for enough finances to absolutely handle the exportable surplus.

It is my own feeling that the only successful way a surplus can be handled is by such an adequate plan of financing unless the allotment plan is constitutional. If that is constitutional it can be done by the criminal-law process and the buyers forced to pay the cost-of-production price. They will then need no Government funds to carry out the plan. I think the Senator from Utah should especially be favorable to the allotment plan because it requires no funds for its operation. It is a mandate of the law. If it is constitutional, of course, it will get the farmers that price. There is very serious doubt about the constitutionality, I admit, but it is the job of the Supreme Court to figure that out; and why should we worry about a thing like that when they have taken all that responsibility upon themselves?

Here is the way the Democrats fixed the cost-of-production price and it is absolutely sound and workable. They had the Farm Board figure up and determine the cost of production, using the same methods the Agricultural Department does, although there should be some elements increased. Compensation for farm labor and allowance for depreciation should be increased over anything the Agricultural Department has allowed, but it is easy to figure the average cost of production of the farm products. It is easier to figure it up than it is to figure up the cost of producing an automobile or most any piece of machinery. The accounting question is simpler and easier to handle.

The Farm Board, which the Democrats appointed on the 14th of August, 1917, completed its deliberations in 16 days and fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 No. 1 northern. It absolutely fixed the price. There was not any quibbling about price fixing or its unsoundness or the economic features or its impossibility or anything of that kind. They fixed the price. As soon as they fixed the price the Wheat Corporation paid that price for all the wheat that was offered it, and that settled the price question. It went to that level and stayed there as long as the Wheat Corporation lasted. The board of trade went out of business the same day that was done and never sold another bushel of wheat on futures while the Wheat Corporation lasted. In that operation, when they came to dispose of the surplus finally, they had a profit of $59,000,000, due to world shortage in wheat. The price was put at $2.20 and later to $2.26 when the railroad rates went up, and then went up much higher and the profits on the whole deal were $59,000,000.

When I put that proposition to him the chairman of the Farm Board testified that $1,000,000,000 additional would enable them to handle cotton, wheat, corn, oats, livestock, and rice. Those are the principal staple crops of the United States. That would be enough money to handle them all in that way. He said we might not always have a loss now any more than they did following the war, because in nearly every 7-year period of human history there is a shortage of food products, and even of cotton. It has always been consumed. There has always been a world demand for it. It is really a question of long-time financing to hold for that demand. We may have a loss. I do not think we can always have a profit on disposing of the surplus. There are two ways of paying that loss—one by the debenture plan out of the United States Treasury and the other by the equalization-fee tax on the farmer.

However, this bill does not provide the revolving fund necessary to handle the exportable surplus as I think it should be handled, so under the bill we have to come back either to the equalization fee to get the fund or to the debenture plan. The equalization fee would provide the money to pay the losses, and that is a tax on the farmer and no liability for the United States Treasury at all. The administration of it is going to be a big difficulty, because the collection of this fee on 6,500,000 farms in the United States is certainly a very difficult thing. Governor Lowden himself, perhaps being the nearest to the authorship of the equalization fee, I think, admitted to me that it might be impossible. At any rate, the farmers, if they would do that and get an organization to do it, could perfect an organization that would be mighty valuable for them in marketing the other things they produced and in the contact with the general farm business. It is worth trying out.

The administration of the debenture is very easy. I would rather see the bill modified so that the debenture would go to the Farm Board, though not acting on its present policy, because I disapprove of its present policy as much as anybody in the Chamber; but if it were given the policy that we had under the old Democratic law of 1919 and required to do certain things, and if it were made mandatory to follow that policy, then I would like to see the debenture go to the Farm Board to pay the losses instead of any equalization-fee tax on the farmer. I think the Treasury owes it to the farmers to pay these losses, too, because we certainly have issued debentures to almost every other line of business in the country in one way and another.

I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the $529,000,000 debenture we paid the railroads after we turned them back under the Esch-Cummins railroad law of 1920. We also embodied in that law a recapture clause of half their profits over 6 per cent, which has mounted up to $361,000,000 more, but the House committee has reported favorably a bill granting that accumulated fund to the railroads as a further debenture. Then we have just provided a debenture in the form of $500,000,000 of Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to the railroads and banks and insurance companies and organizations of that kind. If we will go back through the history of our country, we can find instances where debentures have been piled up so high that by contrast mountains will look small indeed.

Under those circumstances, now when agriculture has come to this emergency it seems to me the debenture is well justified. My criticism of the debenture provided in this bill is that it is at too low a rate; it is not high enough. It goes directly to the exporter, which would mean a constant drain and loss on the Treasury. If it were paid to the Federal Farm Board, under the other policy, then the Federal Farm Board might by proper handling of the exportable surplus at some time have a profit. That would relieve us of the debenture tax. The chairman of the Federal Farm Board testified that there would be profits at various times on different ones of the farm products. So much for the equalization fee and the debenture.

I rose, however, principally to speak about the allotment plan. The allotment plan is another Democratic plan. The author of it is William G. McAdoo—at least he is the first one who brought it to my attention. I put his plan in the RECORD a month or two ago. I then commented on it, stating that if it were constitutional it might work without the necessity of putting up any funds, because it fixes the price of farm products on the cost-of-production basis, just as did the old Democratic law which was passed in 1919, and then, after fixing the prices, it, by mandate of law, commands the millers and the processors to pay that price to the farmers, and puts a penalty upon them if they fail to do so. If that be constitutional, it would be the handiest, smoothest, most convenient way possible to give the farmers a cost of production price for their products. I hope the Supreme Court will hold it to be constitutional. Mr. McAdoo stated that it was constitutional, and Senators will find in the RECORD, at the point where I placed his statement, a citation of the authorities upon which he relied to sustain his contention as to its constitutionality.

So, Mr. President, for those reasons I should dislike to see the allotment plan stricken from the bill. It will not invalidate the other parts of the bill if the Supreme Court should set it aside as being unconstitutional. So let us leave it in, and we may find out something; we may find out an easy and a simple way of controlling the price of farm products. France is controlling the prices of farm products in that way now and is assuring a good price to her farmers. Germany is controlling farm prices in that way now and is also assuring a good price to her farmers. It would be an unfavorable commentary on the Constitution of the United States if it should turn out that we do not have power to do something of that kind for the farmers of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is conceded that the Senator from Iowa has given profound study to the problems of agriculture; that he has been an earnest advocate of legislation that he thought would promote the welfare of the farmers, I admit. His views, however, have not always found support in the Senate, and I have not been willing to indorse some propositions which he has with earnestness advocated. As I listened to the Senator's address I was somewhat in doubt—and that doubt still persists—as to whether he was not damning the bill before us with faint praise. As I understand his position with respect to Title III of the pending bill—being what is known as the allotment plan—he has doubts as to its constitutionality and is uncertain as to its practical workings. I agree with his position with respect to the Farm Board. As I recall his language, he stated that he was as much opposed to the Farm Board and its policies as any Senator or any person could be.

Mr. President, I think there is a widespread feeling throughout the United States that the so-called agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929, has utterly failed to accomplish what was promised in its behalf. During the last presidential campaign our Republican friends, in urging the election of Mr. Hoover, claimed that he would sponsor a measure that would solve the agricultural problem and bring prosperity to the American farmers. We all remember that Mr. Hoover and the Republican orators declared that if the Republican Party were continued in power, it would promptly enact measures that would place agriculture upon a parity with other industries and would thus increase the purchasing power of the farmers and bring to them prosperous conditions. Immediately after Mr. Hoover was inaugurated a special session of Congress was convened to deal with the agricultural situation.

The President and the Republican leaders declared that relief for agriculture was of paramount importance and that the situation was such as to justify an extraordinary session of Congress. In view of the promises which had been made during the campaign, as well as in the Republican platform, and in view of the many statements made by Mr. Hoover during the campaign and following his election, the American people were led to believe that some concrete, practical, and effective measure would be recommended by the President which, when enacted into law, would bring relief to agriculture. The agricultural marketing act, commonly called the Farm Board act, was acclaimed by partisan Republicans, by many of the unthinking public, and by some farmers who were ready to grasp at any project submitted, even though it was shadowy, that promised relief; and so the Farm Board act was given to the people with the enthusiastic commendations of the Republican Party and the blessings of President Hoover. The bill carried an appropriation of $500,000,000, which was to be used to aid the farmers and which it was claimed would constitute a revolving fund from which enormous benefits would be derived by the farmers in all parts of the country. The farmers were soon disillusioned and their expectations were not fulfilled.

The condition of the farmers of our country has grown progressively worse since Mr. Hoover was elected and since the enactment of the agricultural marketing act. Perhaps agriculture is in a more serious plight to-day than ever before in the history of the Republic. Hundreds of thousands of farmers have lost their homes and the mortgage indebtedness upon their farms amounts to billions of dollars. Our Republican friends have been in power in all branches of the Government since March, 1921, and during this intervening period the troubles and vicissitudes of the farmers have been greatly increased, until to-day their condition is most deplorable. During the period just referred to, no legislation has been enacted to aid the farmer or to mitigate his sufferings. The only measure which the statesmanship of the party in power could evolve was the marketing act, which has been condemned from one end of the country to the other and which has just come under the condemnation of the able Senator from Iowa.

Measures are pending in both the House and the Senate to abolish the Farm Board because of the confirmed belief that it has been an injury rather than a benefit. Certainly it has failed to measure up to the promises made or to afford relief to the farmers of the United States. It is true that it has loaned large sums of money taken from the taxpayers of the United States, and it is equally certain that no inconsiderable part of the $500,000,000 placed in its hands will be lost to the Treasury and to the taxpayers of the United States. Under the operation of the Farm Board the wheat and cotton markets have been demoralized, and the producers of those commodities have suffered irreparable loss by reason of the unwise and unsound policies of the Farm Board.

It is to be regretted that we do not have before us a measure that would prove of benefit to the farmers of the United States. It seems to me that with the lessons of the past, and the manifest failure of the administration's pet plan—the agricultural marketing act—there would have been presented to Congress a measure possessing merit and giving reasonable assurance that the farmers would derive some relief from the dire straits in which they find themselves.

But the measure before us is as disappointing as the Farm Board act. It is conceded that Title III of the bill, the allotment plan, possesses provisions clearly unconstitutional; and during the debate it has been conclusively demonstrated that it is unworkable and could not be put into operation. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] practically concedes that it is unconstitutional, but contends, if I properly interpret his remarks, that the question of whether this bill is constitutional is for the Supreme Court and that Congress ought not to hesitate to pass a measure because of dubiety as to its validity. Mr. President, I respectfully dissent from this philosophy of the able Senator. Senators have subscribed to oaths to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. Manifestly they would not be upholding and defending the Constitution if they supported measures which were unconstitutional and which they believed to be unconstitutional. In my opinion, if Senators have doubts as to the constitutionality of measures before them, they should not resolve the doubts in favor of the measures, but against them. It is true that under our form of Government the final decision rests with the Supreme Court; but it is my view that the legislative branch should reject measures which clearly are unconstitutional or raise serious doubts in the minds of Senators and Representatives as to their constitutionality.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the beginning, I agree with the Senator that the Constitution contemplated Members of Congress should pass upon its provisions and enact laws in conformity to the Constitution; but the Supreme Court has assumed, without any specific provision of the Constitution, to say to Congress, "We will decide that question and that decision is final." We have no way to avoid it now. When John Marshall first announced that decision Thomas Jefferson was President and it almost resulted in the impeachment of Marshall, and I am rather sorry that it did not, because I think the power ought to rest with the Congress. However, I have not any way to divine how the Supreme Court is going to decide on these constitutional questions, and I do not believe the Senator from Utah has. I do not believe any Senator can tell in advance what will be its decision, and there are so many of its decisions rendered by a vote of 5 to 4 that the Supreme Court itself does not know until it has absolutely decided a case whether a given act is constitutional or not. Therefore the whole thing is a gamble as a practical matter. Senators can talk all they please about the sacredness of the oath to uphold the Constitution, but the Constitution remains still the opinion of five out of nine judges. So I think it is a waste of time for us to debate a question which must be decided in that way by the court itself.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not in agreement with the conclusions announced by the Senator, nor do I agree with his position that there is no authority within the Constitution for the Supreme Court to pass upon the validity of acts of the National Legislature. Students of government and particularly of the fundamental principles upon which governments rest, have admitted that one of the distinguishing characteristics of our Government and of the Constitution of the United States, is that a judicial tribunal is created with the authority to review legislative enactments and to declare them violative of the fundamental law of the land. This view is regarded as a distinct contribution to the science of government, and has won the commendation of those versed in judicial procedure, and in the history and development of governmental institutions. But I shall not take up the time of the Senate to further discuss this matter because it was definitely settled, as the Senator indicates, in the days of John Marshall, and the American people are unwilling to mutilate or destroy one of the coordinate branches of the Government or to weaken the authority of the judicial department.

I now refer briefly to Title III. The able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and others who have spoken, have conceded that some of its provisions are unconstitutional. I submit that any attempt to put into operation Title III of this measure would reveal inherent weaknesses and impracticable features. It would require such a vast amount of bureaucratic machinery that resentments would be provoked among the farmers, antagonisms would be aroused that would prevent the execution of its provisions. Any attempt to handle the agricultural products of the United States under the provisions of Title III would be doomed to failure.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has revealed some of its tyrannous and oppressive features and is attempting to have them stricken from the bill. The provisions of Title III seem to ignore our dual form of government and the authority of the States to deal with purely intrastate affairs. The agriculturists of the United States would not submit to the criminal provisions of the bill and to the pains and penalties which it prescribes. There is entirely too much bureaucracy in the United States now, and to give the Farm Board the authority to practically control all agricultural products of the United States would arouse such opposition among the agriculturists and the people of the United States as to prevent the enforcement of such provisions.

I doubt whether there are many who have been inclined to support the bill understand its provisions. Title III provides that the Farm Board shall ascertain and make public the quantity of any agricultural product needed for domestic consumption. It is obvious that all agricultural products—which include, of course, meats, cereals, dairy products, fruits, vegetables, and so forth—are brought under this provision; and it is clear that it would be impossible for the Farm Board, without an army at its command, and even then it would fail, to ascertain what part of all these various products are needed for domestic consumption. But concede that such could be done, then the board is to determine what portion of any or all of these products may be sold at a price, not less than the cost of production, as ascertained by such board; that is, the board shall ascertain the cost of production of all such commodities and then determine which commodities shall not enter commerce—that is, shall not be bought or sold at a price less than the cost of production. Can anyone assume that the millions of agriculturists would quietly submit to this authority of the board? But that is not all; the board is to determine what part is surplus and shall determine whether it shall be exported, withheld from the market, or disposed of "in any manner that the board shall direct"; but it may not be disposed of in the domestic market.

If the board determines that 1,000,000 tons of hay were all that were required for domestic use in the United States, and a million and a half tons were raised, the board would fix the price at which the million tons should be sold in the United States, and then, with respect to the 500,000 tons of surplus, they would order that it might not be sold in the United States, and they would have the authority to order it burned or destroyed or disposed of in any manner, except that it might not be sold or disposed of in the domestic market. If a farmer living in Idaho or Arizona or New Hampshire had a few tons in excess of the amount determined by the board to be the needs of the domestic market, the grower of such product could not dispose of it in the United States. Any person buying it would be guilty of a crime under the bill and liable to six months' imprisonment and a $500 fine. I have not time, Mr. President, to analyze the provisions of Title III. They have received some attention at the hands of a number of Senators, and I think they are condemned by many Senators as being unsound, unworkable, and unconstitutional.

Mr. President, measures that might be workable in a small country like Denmark or Holland can not be applied in a country so vast as that of the 48 States of the Union. The varied resources of the United States, the great variety of agricultural commodities, the diverse climatic conditions, all tend to make it impossible to apply policies and laws which might be satisfactory in limited areas and where there are homogeneous conditions.

With respect to Title I—the equalization-fee plan—Senators will recall that a similar measure passed the House and the Senate and was vetoed by President Coolidge. His message was a vigorous criticism of the bill and as I recall contained a strong argument against its constitutionality. There were Senators who voted against the bill solely because they believed that it was unconstitutional. The Senator from Idaho declared yesterday, in referring to the provisions of Title I of this bill, that in his opinion it was unconstitutional. There are other Senators on the floor now who entertained the same view. I shall not take the time of the Senate to present the constitutional aspects of the provisions of this title. I might add, however, that in my opinion it would not survive a challenge to its validity.

I call attention to one provision of the bill, not for the purpose of showing that the equalization-fee provision is unconstitutional but for the purpose of indicating the limitless commitments which the bill contains. On page 6 of the bill there is a provision which is in effect a blank check placed in the hands of the Farm Board drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States. I doubt whether there are many Senators who are willing to give such authority to the Farm Board. The provision referred to makes the United States liable for all losses resulting from the attempts to carry out the operations of the equalization-fee plan in excess of the amounts available in the stabilization, premium insurance, and revolving fund. It is obvious that there may be enormous losses in attempting to carry out the provisions of this title—losses greatly in excess of the equalization fee—and all such losses are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The Senator from Iowa has admitted, if I understood his position, that there would be losses; that the low prices of agricultural commodities would perhaps make it impossible for the equilization fees to be paid or for profits to be obtained, and the inevitable result would be that the Treasury of the United States would be resorted to to meet the losses which would be sustained.

Title II of the bill is known as the debenture plan. When the Farm Board bill was under consideration in the Senate an amendment was adopted which contained similar provisions to these contained in Title II of this bill. I voted for the debenture plan believing that it would afford some benefit to agriculture. President Hoover, as I now recall, signified his opposition to the debenture provision in a communication to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate. As I now recall, the provision, notwithstanding the opposition of the President, was added to the bill in the Senate, but in conference it was eliminated, the reason, as I understood, being the pronounced and implacable opposition of the President to its terms.

Mr. President, I believed then as I believe now, that the debenture plan would be of benefit to the farmers of the United States, and if the bill before us contained only the debenture plan I should be glad to give it my support. But as I have indicated, the provision of the bill found in the other two titles possesses so many objections that I can not vote for the bill in its present form.

In my opinion, the bill should be sent back to the Agricultural Committee where it could be redrafted and reformed. That committee could within a few days report a measure back to the Senate that would be free from constitutional objections and also would not contain provisions inconsistent with liberty of action upon the part of producers and which would place the agriculturists of the United States in a strait-jacket.

The Senator from Iowa admits that the bill before us is not adequate to meet the situation, and insists that a billion dollars be directly appropriated to aid in caring for the surplus products of agriculture and in giving aid to the farmers. I am sanguine that every Senator is desirous of enacting measures that possess merit and will give relief to agriculture. Speaking for myself, I should welcome the opportunity to vote for a measure that would be of advantage to the farmers of the United States, but I am unwilling to vote for unsound measures or propositions which I believe to be unconstitutional or plans that will subject the American producer to autocratic, capricious, and unrestrained bureaucratic control. I am unwilling to support a measure that to enforce its provisions would call for an army of Federal employees that would harass, vex, and annoy the agriculturists of the United States and attempt to impose upon them restrictions and restraints that would be provocative of resentment and arouse violent and open opposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to make a short statement. I offered a motion some time ago to strike out what is known as the allotment plan. My idea was that that was the only way by which we could save the debenture in the bill. I felt quite sure that if the allotment plan remained in the bill, the bill would either be defeated or sent back to the committee for further consideration. I should like to save the debenture portion of the bill. I am quite sure that the allotment plan is not workable as presented in this bill, and I am quite sure it is not constitutional. We are jeopardizing all legislation. We are taking a chance of getting no legislation. I do not think we should do that. I want to get what we can and give agriculture the best we can get under the circumstances. However, those who are deeply interested in the subject state that they have worked out a kind of triple plan, combining the views of the different farm organizations, and that they feel that they should like to have the matter go up or go down together. I am yielding to that course. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion to strike out the allotment plan; and the friends of the measure may take what course they think proper. I hope I am in error, but it does not seem to me the right course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws his motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the withdrawal by the Senator from Idaho of his motion to strike out Title III brings the Senate face to face with the bill containing the three titles as it came from the committee, with but a few amendments added during its consideration. With the views which I have entertained, and which I have so imperfectly expressed, I believe that the bill should undergo important modifications. It is obvious that such modifications and amendments can not satisfactorily be made while the bill is under discussion. It seems manifest, therefore, that the bill should be recommitted in order that the Committee on Agriculture might prepare a measure that will not possess the infirmities which characterize the pending bill. I am sure that it can, within a short time, as I have before stated, prepare a measure that will receive the support of a majority of the Senate as well as of the House. The committee, of course, will keep in mind the attitude of the President and his position with respect to the debenture plan, and the constitutional objections urged by President Coolidge, as well as by others, to the equalization plan; but I believe that the committee will be able to frame a measure which, if enacted into law, would afford relief to the farmers of the United States.

Mr. President, I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dale	King	Schall
Austin	Davis	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Lewis	Shipstead
Barbour	Fletcher	McGill	Shortridge
Blaine	Frazier	McKellar	Steiwer
Borah	George	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Glass	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Glenn	Moses	Townsend
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Neely	Tydings
Caraway	Gore	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Carey	Harrison	Norris	Wagner
Cohen	Howell	Nye	Walcott
Connally	Hull	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Johnson	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Copeland	Kean	Reed	Watson
Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Couzens	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.	White
Cutting

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HOWELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I desire to say a few words on this matter.

I think it very unfair to recommit the bill after it has been before the Agricultural Committee for months, and after it has been on the calendar here for weeks. It is impossible to get a bill that will suit everyone. This bill has been considered by the heads of the farm organizations, by various experts to whom they have referred the measure, and they believe that the provisions of the measure can be worked out in such a way as to take care of the situation satisfactorily and to give the farmers a price based on cost of production.

It has been stated that we can not fix prices here in Congress. The Congress has made provision for fixing prices in various instances, and they have worked, too.

For instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been given authority to fix the rates for railroads. It has done so, and the plan has worked; and until this so-called depression struck us in the last couple of years the railroads have been prosperous under that method.

The Congress has given the Federal Reserve Board the power to fix rates of interest, and those rates stand; and, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] stated, the board has also fixed the very value of money itself.

When, however, it comes to fixing the price of any food product that the farmers produce to feed the Nation, some one always gets up here and says that it is unconstitutional, and will not work, and can not be carried out.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to inform the Senator from North Dakota, who is always assiduous in behalf of the farmers, that this bill being recommitted, which I favor, he will find great relief upon reconsideration where the Supreme Court of the United States, in declaring features of the Lever Act invalid, points out a method by which something can be done along the idea that my eminent friend has expressed. He is quite right in the assertion that a way can be found; and I take the liberty of bringing to his attention the opinion in the Lever case as suggesting something which, upon recommittal of this bill, might remedy his whole difficulty.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I do not agree with the eminent Senator from Illinois with regard to the recommittal of the bill. It seems to me the only way to try out a measure of this kind is to do what the Congress did with the Federal reserve act, for instance. They passed the act, and it has been amended time after time. This measure probably would need to be amended; but if it could be put into operation and tried out it would give the Farm Board, whose duty it would be to test out this bill, a chance to find out by actual experiment what provisions will work and what provisions will not work, and then to come back to Congress and ask for amendments to make it workable.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to say to the Senator that I agree thoroughly with the position he takes, and that it is my judgment that the propositions involved in this bill ought to be given a trial. It is the duty of those who oppose this measure to present something in its stead. Otherwise, they ought to vote to give it a trial.

Mr. FRAZIER. I thank the Senator from Texas. That is my attitude exactly.

In this session of Congress we have passed a number of measures for the benefit of the financial-interests group, for the bankers, the railroads, and the insurance companies. Up to date practically nothing has been done for the farmer. This measure has been indorsed by the three big farm organizations. The allotment plan, I am frank to admit, was the proposal of the Farmers' Union. The Farmers' Union is one of the big real farm organizations. They feel that that proposition will give the farmers cost of production for the amount of their product that is sold for home consumption here in the United States.

Mr. President, there is no question in my mind but that some proposition of this kind can be worked out whereby the farmer will receive the cost of production for that amount of his product that is used for consumption here at home; and why not? Does anyone think it is fair to ask the farmer to continue from year to year producing his products and selling them below the cost of production? Can any other line of business, no matter what it is or where it is, exist and make a success under those circumstances, selling its goods below cost? It is impossible, Mr. President, and every Member here knows it.

It is mighty nice for Members of the Senate to get up here and make spread-eagle speeches and say they are for agriculture—oh, yes; "Save the poor farmer!"—and then when it comes to a vote on a proposition that the farmers think will give them some benefit they say, "I can not vote for it because it may be unconstitutional."

The Supreme Court has the last guess on this constitutional question, anyway.

Up in North Dakota a few years ago we passed through the State legislature a grain grading act, to grade and inspect grain that was produced there in the State and sold to the local elevators, the local market. The opposition, the grain trade, immediately did as the financial group always do when they can not block legislation in any other way—they take it into court and try to get it declared unconstitutional. So this grain-grading case was taken into court; and after it finally reached the Supreme Court a majority of that court decided that it was unconstitutional, because they said that when this grain was sold by the farmer to the local elevator in his home town it might be shipped out of the State and become interstate wheat, and therefore the State legislature had nothing to do with it. So anyone who thinks that these farm products are not interstate products, and that the bill will be unconstitutional because of that, has another guess coming, because the Supreme Court guessed on this, and only three justices dissented. Justice Brandeis and Justice Holmes and Justice Clarke were the dissenting members in this opinion; and to my mind their opinion was much sounder and much more logical than the opinion of the court as rendered; but, of course, the majority ruled.

Mr. President, it is commonly estimated that at least 90 per cent of farm products go outside of the State where they are produced; that they are shipped across State lines and become interstate products. So I do not think there is any question but that the Supreme Court would hold, as they did in this case, that these products are interstate products, and that the Congress has the right to set up a board that will fix prices upon them.

Mr. President, farm prices to-day are the lowest that they have been in history. They are lower than any Member of the Senate ever saw them before. They are so low that the farmer is not getting anything like cost of production. The full amount of the tariff on farm products will not give cost of production for a single item on which there is a tariff to-day; not one; and yet it is said that half of the tariff in the debenture plan will help the farmer. It will help him a little bit, of course. It will just delay a little the fatal day of losing his farm and going out of business.

Mr. President, the farmers are no exception to the rule. They must have cost of production for their products, or they are not going to continue as home owners and producers of the food products to feed the Nation. If Senators want the farmers to be tenants and serfs, they will vote to kill this bill by sending it back to the committee, for that is what it would mean; but if they want to give the farmers a chance, they will vote against the motion. Many Senators who are going to vote against this measure to-day did not hesitate to vote for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, although some thought—and some said on the floor—that parts of that measure were unconstitutional, that it was unfair; yet they voted for it. It has not worked out the way it was expected it would work, or the way we were told it would. Possibly this measure would not, but we should give it a chance, and, if it did not work, it could be amended.

I hope the motion will be defeated.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I just rise to express the hope that the bill be given the same consideration other legislation has been given. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has wrestled with this problem for months. The session is drawing to a close. If we had a month or two ahead of us, there would be no reason why the committee could not go into the matter further, but it is too late now. Therefore, Mr. President, I suggest that a vote to recommit at this late date is simply a refusal to consider farm legislation at this session. If amendments are, in the opinion of a majority, necessary, there will be plenty of chance to vote for them on the floor without killing the bill in this way.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would an amendment to the bill be in order now that a motion to recommit is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to recommit takes precedence.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, from what inquiry I have been able to make, although my information is not by any means final or conclusive, I have gathered that the motion to recommit is going to carry. I believe it will be conceded by everybody here that that would mean the death of the bill at this session of Congress.

I am also informed, from what little investigation I have been able to make and what I have been able to gather from other Senators, that if the allotment plan were stricken out, the Senate would refuse to recommit the bill, but would pass it in the form in which it then would be.

Mr. President, even though I favor the bill as it stands now, I would rather get a half loaf than to have no bread. If the allotment plan were stricken out, there would still remain in the bill the debenture plan and the equalization-fee plan, two plans which on several occasions have passed the Senate. One of them passed the Senate and the House and was vetoed by the President of the United States.

I believe that those who are particularly anxious to pass some kind of a farm-relief measure at this session are taking upon themselves a terrible responsibility when they insist that the allotment plan shall remain in the bill and that it shall all go down together or all be passed together. I dislike to disagree with those with whom I have worked conscientiously for a great many years as to what the farm policy should be. I think I see their viewpoint. I recognize their earnestness and their sincerity when they say the allotment plan will give cost of production.

If we stood any show of getting it, and if it were workable as we have it, I would have more reason in my own mind for following that kind of an argument. But if we are confronted, as I believe we are, with the proposition that in order to pass this bill that part of it must be stricken out, then I believe we ought to consent to striking it out, and pass the bill with it out.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that I desire to offer an amendment to substitute the debenture for the whole bill; but under the rules that is not in order, now that the motion to recommit has been made. Would the Senator from Nebraska be willing to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that we might consider this amendment now?

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather take the debenture alone than to have no bill; but as near as I can find out, I think the votes are here to pass the bill if the allotment plan is stricken out and the other two plans are left in.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that this amendment does not leave it to the Farm Board to put the debenture on, but it would be put on by the act itself. Would not the Senator agree to have a vote on this amendment prior to the vote on recommittal?

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather have the bill framed so that it would not be discretionary with the board.

Mr. CONNALLY. That would be the result of adopting my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The same question arose when plans for farm relief were being considered in conference, and I gave it careful consideration, as I think others on the conference committee did; and again we said that rather than take a chance upon defeat we would put in the debenture plan and make it discretionary with the board to put it into operation, and that is how it went in on the tariff bill. That is the way the amendment was applied when it went on the marketing bill—not because some of us who were heartily in favor of the debenture plan liked it that way, but we thought it was our only hope of getting it. We did get it through the Senate, but on account of the opposition of the President it was stricken out.

I do not believe there is anybody here but who thinks it is very doubtful whether the President will sign the bill when it gets to him. I have always been one of those, and I still am, who think we ought to do our duty as we see it and let the President do his duty as he sees it. But if we pass this bill with the allotment plan in it, as it stands in the bill to-day, and it goes through the House in that form and goes to the President in that form, we will have put into the hands of the President an argument in favor of a veto message which will command the favorable judgment of a majority of the Senate itself. We will have made it possible for him to defeat the legislation on this subject and give him an opportunity to make an argument in favor of his veto that will appeal to the country as being sound. Of course, it does not follow, if this bill passes just as it is, that the allotment plan will be put into effect, because the discretion would be given to the board to put it into effect or not, or to put into effect any one of the three plans.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The President would have it within his power to say to his board whether or not it should be put into operation. If he thought it was unconstitutional, he could leave it alone.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, he could; but when he wrote his veto message that is not what he would say.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what we would say to him if he wrote any other kind of a veto message.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course; I realize that, and that is one reason why I am going to vote against the motion to recommit. I will vote for this bill with the allotment plan in it, although in my own judgment some of the arguments which are made against it are good. I do not think it is properly worked out. But I am willing to leave it in. I am willing to vote for the bill with it in. The President of the United States, as the Senator from Iowa has said, would not have to put it into operation unless he wanted to. Of course, the board may do what he tells them to. But we would be giving to him an argument to bolster a veto message which he would not have if we sent the bill to him without the allotment plan in it. We would make it possible to pass the bill, I think, through both Houses of Congress rather than to say that we are going to have it all or none, and get none.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, in regard to furnishing the President an argument for vetoing the bill, there did not seem to be any trouble with his vetoing the farmer bill which included one of these features, and the statement was made here on the floor of the Senate that the Secretary of Commerce at that time was the man who wrote the veto message. I do not know anything about that, but that was the statement made here.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; but that has nothing to do with what I am saying. If we are going to pass this bill and get it vetoed, I would rather pass it in such a form as to take away all logical argument which could be put behind a veto message, and that would not be the condition in which the bill would go to him if the allotment plan stays in.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have been necessarily out of the Chamber for a few minutes, and I would like to ask the Senator whether any effort has been made by any direct motion to remove the allotment plan from the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; after consultation with a great many Members of the Senate, a motion was made by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to strike the allotment plan out. I thought it was generally understood by the friends of this kind of legislation that that was to be done unanimously. The Senator from Idaho withdrew his motion because of a disagreement among the friends of the measure, some of them quite bitter, who stated that they must have this feature in, or they did not want anything. The Senator from Idaho just withdrew the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will bear with me for a moment, the impression I get from my contacts on this side of the Chamber is that the allotment plan is the particular feature of the bill which is offensive.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is what I am trying to say.

Mr. COPELAND. And if that were omitted from the bill, there would be a chance of the passage of the rest of the measure without any particular difficulty.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems generally conceded that the Senate will pass the bill with that taken out, and that it will not pass it if that stays in.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. With regard to the statement of the Senator from New York, the allotment plan ought to be the most popular plan on the Democratic side, because its author is one of the most distinguished Democrats in this country, Mr. William G. McAdoo.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not want the statement made by the Senator from New York to go unchallenged, at least so far as I am concerned. He does not reflect my position, and I do not think he speaks the views of at least all the Senators on this side, when he says that with the elimination of the allotment plan those on this side would be for the bill. There are objections to the equalization fee on the ground of its unconstitutionality, which was referred to by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], a few days ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not want to convey the idea that the Senate is unanimously for any of the plans. There are objections to every one of them. But I believe all will agree that there seems to be a general understanding that the allotment plan, while it may be right in principle, has not been worked out, and that the way it is stated in the pending bill it is so objectionable that a majority of the Senate will not vote for the bill with that in.

There never was any legislation of any importance but what there had to be compromises made. I think I can say without criticism what I am saying, because I voted for both the debenture and the equalization-fee plan many times. I have my preference. I can not get just what I want. I am going to vote against recommitting the bill. I am going to vote to pass it if the vote to recommit shall be defeated, even if it is presented to me in the exact form in which it now appears. So that it is not because of any prejudice I have, but I believe those who are standing out for the farmer and saying they are going to have it all or none, that they will not compromise on anything, are not looking after the interests of agriculture in this country in the best way.

We must respect the opinions of others. We must compromise in the Senate and in the House, and between the Senate and the House if we get anything. I agree with every word said by the Senator from North Dakota about the injustice that has been done to the farmer, but it is my judgment that is not a sufficient reason why we should now say that we are going to have this bill just as we want it, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," or we will not take anything.

There is no question that we all agree, as I understand it, that the danger to the bill is the allotment plan. Those who favor the allotment plan know and say that even in the event President Hoover should sign the bill the allotment plan would not be put into operation. Perhaps he would not put it into operation, but that is his responsibility.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that we who want to do something for the farmer ought to agree to strike out the allotment plan. If we do not do something of that kind, we will probably not get any legislation, because if the bill is recommitted, it is dead so far as this session of Congress is concerned, and everybody knows it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if Senators will do me the honor to give me their attention, I shall detain them for a moment only. We have severally taken this oath:

> I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

The bill before us, Mr. President, contains unconstitutional provisions. I do not pause to give my reasons for so thinking. Nor is it necessary for me to do so. It has been admitted that there are important provisions in the bill which are unconstitutional. A Senator who enjoys national reputation as a constitutional lawyer has stated, and other Senators perhaps equally learned in the law, have admitted and stated that there are provisions in the bill manifestly, unquestionably unconstitutional. If that be so, how can I or how can other Senators, mindful of the oath we have taken, vote for the bill in its present form?

The immediate question, however, is the recommital of the bill to the appropriate committee. I think the suggestion of the learned Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], himself a profound lawyer, was very timely; for it is conceivable that the bill can be so amended, so remodeled as to relieve it from its present unconstitutional provisions, so that we could vote for it, stripped of its unconstitutional features.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senate by proclaiming myself a friend of the farmer. If my attitude toward the farmer—the agriculturist, the horticulturist—is questioned, ask the people who know me and they will make answer. I assume we are all friends of the farmer, friends of the city man, friends of all the people of our land whom we are here to serve. The question is how can we best serve them? The immediate question is, How can we best serve those who fall under the term of the farmer—the woolman, the cattleman, the cotton man, the rice man, the poultry man, the dairyman, the almond and walnut man, the lemon and orange man, all those engaged in the multitudinous branches of agriculture and horticulture? We can not serve them by passing an unconstitutional bill.

I submit that in obedience to our oath it is our duty to recommit the bill in the hope that it may be so amended and purged of its admitted unconstitutional provisions as to merit our approval.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think all Senators will agree that whatever can be done to relieve the farmer ought to be done. There certainly can be no division of opinion upon that point. The distress of the farmer can not be unknown to any Member of this body. The desirability of extending relief can not be too much accentuated. I think the point where we differ is as to how far the Government can relieve the distress of the farmer, how far can this Government amend, modify, or repeal economic laws which are more powerful than any enactment of this Congress. There is where the point of difference arises.

Mr. President, this depression is world-wide. It is unsparing in its devastation. It is raging in every country. It is raging under every form of government on the globe. It is raging under monarchies, republics, democracies, and even under dictatorships such as that which prevails in Italy. This depression is raging in old countries and in new. It is ranging in high-tariff and in low-tariff countries. It is raging in gold-standard and in silver-standard countries; in countries that are highly industrialized and in countries whose energies are devoted to the production of raw materials. It has spared none.

If the evils of this depression can be ended or mended by law, they ought to be ended or mended by law. If the evils of this depression could be ended and mended by law, some government somewhere would have put an end to this depression, to its unexampled misery. Not all governments are subject to the malevolent influences of Wall Street or to the sinister machinations of international bankers——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator, in view of his declaration that the depression is world-wide, about Soviet Russia, which has the greatest prosperity it has ever had in all its history?

Mr. GORE. That point is disputed, but I trust it is true. To say that Russia is enjoying the highest measure of prosperity in her history is not a special tribute either to Soviet Russia or the "ancient régime." But I shall not be diverted upon that point.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat that not all governments are subject to the malevolent influence of Wall Street or to the sinister machinations of the international bankers or to other influences which are hostile to the common people or to the common man. I can not believe that if any government anywhere could put an end to this ravaging depression, that it would hesitate to do so. The government that would hesitate would be criminal in its neglect of duty. A government that could end this depression and would not end it, ought itself to be ended by revolution. This Government did not cause and can not cure this depression. Let us tell the people the truth. If "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," what of hopes that are blasted?

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has several times alluded to an act passed on March 4, 1919, under a Democratic administration, which guaranteed the price of wheat for the year 1919. I am not certain that all Senators properly apprehend the motives which actuated that legislation, the object which it was designed to accomplish, or the solemn obligation which made its enactment imperative.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The only obligation was the statement or promise of the President of the United States that the farmers should have the same price for their wheat in 1919 that they received in 1918. There was no legal promise or any legal obligation of any kind.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is mistaken as to his general conclusion. He is correct, however, in stating that it was an obligation incurred by a presidential proclamation. On the 2nd of September, 1918, the President of the United States did issue a proclamation fixing the price of wheat for the harvest of 1919 at $2.26 a bushel basis Chicago. That proclamation was based on section 14 of the so-called food control act, which undertook to give the President the authority which he exercised in that proclamation. We must all agree that it was a valid proclamation and it did guarantee the farmers of the country $2.26 a bushel for the harvest of 1919. It was a war measure. We were still in the throes of the war. It was said on every hand that bread would win the war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if we are not right now in the throes of a depression a good deal worse than any war?

Mr. GORE. I think in many respects it is immeasurably worse.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the war argument is not of much force against the Government doing something at this time.

Mr. GORE. I am coming to that point. I will dispose of the point which the Senator has previously raised.

That proclamation was made September 2, 1918, on the eve of the sowing season. Farmers in the winter-wheat country increased their acreage 16 per cent. In order to respond to the urgent request of their Government, acreage was run up from 43,000,000 to 49,000,000 of winter wheat alone. The armistice came on November 11, 1918. This vast acreage had been seeded by the farmers, animated by patriotic duty. Fear was felt that the price of wheat might decline and that the farmers would suffer loss on account of the patriotic response to the presidential proclamation.

It so happened that I was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry at the time and that I had charge of the measure to which the Senator from Iowa has repeatedly referred. It was designed to keep an express obligation. At the hazard of trespassing upon the patience of the Senate I would like to have read at this point one or two extracts from remarks which I submitted at that time, in order to show to some extent the motives back of the legislation and at least the philosophy which I entertained at that time and which I still entertain in regard to the pending measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

I need not remind the Senate that I was opposed to this whole scheme of price fixing. On March 21, 1918, I said here in the Senate: "In my judgment such an effort is foreordained to fail. Perhaps the oldest blunder known to the sons of men is the attempt at price fixing. The history of the effort is one dreary tale of uniform and unvarying failure, of disappointment, and ofttimes of disaster. Whenever the attempt is made to regulate prices the effort must inevitably work more or less mischief."

Mr. President, I regarded the scheme as uneconomic; I regarded the scheme as inevitably unjust. Human wisdom and foresight are not equal to the task. If the Government should fix the price of wheat at the point where the law of supply and demand would fix it, then you would have your labor for your pains, and the whole process would be vain and unavailing. If the Government should fix the price of wheat lower than the law of supply and demand would fix it, that would be both an injury and an injustice to the producer. If the Government should fix the price at a point higher than the law of supply and demand would fix it, that would be an injury and an injustice to the consumer.

The fixing of the price upon wheat for the harvest of 1917—and it was fixed not for the purpose of stimulating production, for the price was fixed in August, and the crop had been harvested in June, July, and August—occasioned a loss to the American farmers aggregating $400,000,000. The fixing of the price upon wheat in 1918 occasioned a loss to the farmers of this country of hardly less than $400,000,000. For the two years the direct loss to the farmers of the United States due to the action of this Government approximated $800,000,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is all I desire to have read at this time; but I will ask to have the further extracts printed in the RECORD as they are marked, and shall not take up the time of the Senate to have them read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order is made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

So, Mr. President, I think that $1,250,000,000 is a larger amount than will be required to meet this obligation. We must be prepared, however, and we must prepare to carry a loss of several hundred million dollars. An ample appropriation should be made. If the money is not needed, it will not be used. If it is needed, it ought to be available in whatever amount may be found necessary. I hope I may be pardoned for saying that if this $1,250,000,000 estimated by the Department of Agriculture serves to protect us against like economic nostrums in the future, if this $1,250,000,000 serves to teach the engineer, the fireman, and the conductor as they crawl out from under the wreckage that they who display a red signal as a warning of danger may be friends rather than enemies, then, sir, this one and a quarter billion will have been well, if not wisely, expended.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, I am unqualifiedly opposed to extending the range of this artificial administration. It may be a matter of inevitable necessity to permit the control of the wheat harvest for the current year, but I would not extend this control into domains where it does not now prevail. I believe that we have got to come down toward the sea level, and we ought to come down on the lock-and-dam system, and not rush down with the violence of the cataract. I for one am not willing to precipitate universal confusion merely for the sake of trying our hand in bringing order out of this confusion which we have precipitated and which we have confounded.

There are three tasks devolving upon us to-day: First, to keep faith with the American farmer in the payment of the guaranty; second, to keep faith with the consumer and see that he purchases bread upon a parity with the other peoples of the earth; and third, to keep faith with the taxpayers of this country and to keep their inevitable loss down to an irreducible minimum.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has stated frankly and without reserve that this is a price-fixing measure. I think that the Senator will agree with me that price fixing during the World War was unfair to our farmers. It caused a loss to the American wheat farmers of at least a billion dollars on the harvests of 1917 and 1918. It will always fail.

Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] suggested that Senators ought to vote for the pending bill or they ought to submit a better proposition. On its face that may seem to be a fair challenge. I do not think it is; it is fallacious. I do not think one need be qualified to prescribe a remedy for cancer or for tuberculosis in order to exercise the privilege of warning the patient not to take strychnine or cyanide of potassium. I do not know how to treat the bubonic plague or to cure the black death. But I would not hesitate to advise the victim of such a pestilence not to take prussic acid. Those who resist an unsound measure are under no compulsion to submit a better measure, particularly where it is sought to repeal the fundamental laws of economics.

Mr. President, I might state my economic philosophy in a sentence—"I do not believe in the fairies." I look upon legislation of this sort as an attempt to achieve the impossible. In England, of course, they have an omnipotent Parliament, at least in theory, and omnipotence ought not to balk at impossibilities. The pending legislation, Mr. President, is an attempt to deal with a surplus that does exist as if it did not exist. That effort is foreordained to fail; it can not succeed.

However, for the moment responding to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I have in some limited measure attempted to discharge my duty toward the farmers. I have introduced two measures at this session, one relating to cotton and one relating to wheat. I regard those two staples as the pillar of our whole agricultural system. I thought if something could be done to mend the price of cotton and to mend the price of wheat it would be a service to our farmers and might set economic forces in motion that would help to bring about a solution of our problems.

The measure in regard to wheat prescribes the amount which should be marketed by the Farm Board, when it should be marketed, and the price at which it should be marketed in order to minimize the evil effect of the wheat which they have impounded and which they are now hoarding. However, in opposition to that measure came trooping here to Washington representatives of the National Grain Corporation, which is a parasite of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, which in turn is a parasite of the Federal Farm Board, which in turn is a parasite upon the Treasury of the United States, a parasite upon the taxpayers of the United States. The Farm Board was voted half a billion dollars, and more than one-half the deficit during the last fiscal year can be charged to that excessive appropriation. The National Grain Corporation paid the expenses of representatives to come here from Idaho, Washington, North Dakota, Kansas, and other States. They paid the expenses of those witnesses to come to this Capitol and bear witness by their presence and testimony against the wheat measure which I introduced. They came trooping here from the four points of the compass, financed by the National Grain Corporation.

I also introduced a measure designed to regulate, and which would have regulated, the marketing of the cotton which the Federal Farm Board has bought and impounded, and which it holds over the head of the market in this country and over the cotton markets of the world.

Nobody knows how to make any calculation for the future; uncertainty reigns, and business halts. It provided that a certain amount of cotton should be marketed each month, beginning July 1, 1933, at a certain price unless the price should rise above the fixed figure, in which event a larger quantity might be marketed.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I happened to be chairman of the subcommittee that considered the bills of the Senator from Oklahoma in regard to wheat and cotton. He stated that some of the cooperative organizations paid the expenses of representatives to come to Washington to appear against those bills. I want to say that the only ones who appeared for the bill besides the Senator from Oklahoma himself were representatives of the grain trade and the cotton trade.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not recall anyone appearing in regard to the wheat measure excepting the witnesses to whom I have referred. I do recall that one citizen from my State requested to be heard on the cotton measure, and, astounding as it may seem, the Senator from North Dakota permitted the other side of the question to be presented, one witness appeared, and a member of the Farm Board charged with the administration of the cotton functions of that ill-starred organization also appeared in opposition to the cotton measure. I have not a doubt that if those two measures had passed they would have enhanced the price of wheat from 5 to 15 cents a bushel and would have enhanced the price of cotton from 2 to 5 cents a pound. They are modest measures, and if you ask me, Mr. President, whether they are economic or not, I say no; but we are in an impossible situation; we have gotten into an uneconomic situation, and there is no ideal pathway out of it. We have got to extricate ourselves sooner or later, and we have got to suffer when we do it; we must pay the penalty of violating fundamental economic laws. There is no escape. It is a good deal like an army being surrounded by a hostile army; it can not escape without fighting its way through the encircling lines, and it must do that at some sacrifice, some loss, some suffering. It was upon that theory that I introduced the two measures to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I repeat what I said in this Senate in 1919, that price fixing is one of the oldest blunders that flesh is heir to. It has been attempted from time immemorial. It never has succeeded; it never will succeed. The same excuses are always made when inevitable failure comes—that if more power had been granted success would have been achieved; if enough power had been bestowed, the scheme could have been made to stand up. That is true. If the board had enough power, they could make the scheme stand up. The only trouble, the only limitation, is that there is not that much power; it is an attempt to accomplish the impossible, which rarely ever succeeds.

Mr. President, not only in ancient times but in modern times has this abortive effort been made. Take the attempt of Brazil to valorize and regulate the price of coffee. Back of that movement was all the power of the Brazilian Government. She undertook to peg the price at 20 cents a pound. She succeeded for a time, but the scheme broke down under its own weight. The price went from 20 cents down to 8 cents a pound, and I believe now it is hovering around 4 cents a pound. Why did it break down? Because the artificially high price restricted consumption, on the one hand, stimulated production, on the other. Other countries adapted to the production of coffee devoted their energies and their capital to its production; the coffee market was oversupplied and the scheme failed. Brazil is now dumping coffee into the sea; it is burning coffee to heat the boilers to drive her locomotives.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GORE. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. NORBECK. I must call the Senator's attention to the fact that the attempt of Brazil to fix the price of coffee was not the attempt of Brazil to fix the price of coffee in Brazil but to fix it in all other countries. This bill is different in that respect, and the two cases are not parallel.

Mr. GORE. Very well; I will take other instances that are parallel. I come now, Mr. President, to the attempt of Great Britain to fix and regulate the price of rubber.

Mr. NORBECK. The price of rubber, where? In the world——

Mr. GORE. In the world; yes.

Mr. NORBECK. Instead of in Great Britain.

Mr. GORE. I will give the Senator the instances.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator has now given two of them.

Mr. GORE. Yes; and I am coming to others.

Mr. NORBECK. Very well.

Mr. GORE. Even though the Senator may chafe to hear these failures, he must listen.

Mr. NORBECK. I think the Senator's speech is very illuminating and very helpful in many respects, but I believe it would be much more powerful if it were made to conform to the facts as they are. Certainly I do not accuse the distinguished and learned Senator from Oklahoma of intentionally doing anything to misrepresent the situation, but I think he is in error. I think there is a distinct difference between trying to fix a price in the world and trying to fix a price within the domain of a particular nation. That is the only point I am making.

Mr. GORE. There is undoubtedly some difference. Neither can be accomplished except in one contingency, and I will describe that before I finish.

I revert to this experiment of Great Britain under the Stevenson Act. Under that measure the price of rubber was run up to $1.20 a pound. For a time it succeeded, because the greatest empire on the globe was backing the scheme, but it finally failed. The load became too heavy to bear. Economic laws asserted their sovereignty over the acts of an omnipotent parliament. The price of rubber broke, and went from $1.20 down to 8 cents a pound. I believe to-day it is around 4 cents a pound. That stands as a monument to the efforts of the greatest empire in the world to repeal economic laws and to fix the price of raw rubber.

What happened, Mr. President?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GORE. In a moment.

The artificially high price of rubber cut down consumption. Every expedient was resorted to in this country to supply the necessitous requirements for rubber. It diminished consumption on the one hand, and it stimulated production on the other. When that attempt began, Great Britain supplied, through her East Indian islands, two-thirds of all the rubber required on the globe. During the brief period of that experiment her quota fell to 50 per cent of the world's requirements, and Americans were scouring the earth to find lands suitable for the production of rubber. The artificially high prices cut down consumption and stimulated production. It was the inevitable reaction to that effort.

Take silk in Japan. Japan undertook to stabilize the price of raw silk. She undertook to peg the price at $16 a pound. She succeeded for a while. Even silk got too heavy to hold, however, and slipped out of the hands of Japan and went down to $2 a pound—how much lower I do not know. Seventy-four thousand bales is Japan's annual output. When her scheme was over, or approaching the end, she had 85,000 bales—more than a year's output—corded up in her warehouses. Japan, in order to leave nothing undone to consummate the folly, appointed a silk-relief board to deal with the subject. She paid us the homage of emulation.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORBECK. I rose a while ago just to suggest that the Senator was in error when he said that the greatest and most monumental mistake in price fixing was in rubber, for I am one of those who think it was the action of the Farm Board in their attempt to fix the price of wheat in the world. I voted against the farm marketing act, thinking that we should profit by the experience of Japan and profit by the experience of Brazil and profit by the experience of Great Britain and learn, once for all, that no one country can go out and fix the price of goods in the world's market.

The Senator and I are together on that point; but I still suggest that that is not what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. GORE. I will come to that. I commend the Senator upon his wisdom; and, really, I stand corrected, because I think he has cited perhaps the premier mistake in all the tides of time. But the Farm Board calculated that if it should buy wheat and hold it off the market, the price of what remained in the market would advance; that if it should buy cotton and hold it off the market, the price of what remained in the market would advance. That was their calculation.

But, Mr. President, nobody on earth could tell what the Farm Board might do with its reserves of wheat and of cotton. Nobody could tell when they might dump 3,000,000 bales of cotton on the cotton market, or 200,000,000 bushels of wheat on the wheat market. It drove private business from the market, because of the confusion and uncertainty which attended every transaction.

Mr. President, what happened with reference to silk? Why, every country that could produce silk devoted itself to the production of silk. The consumption of silk was cut down, and the production of silk was stimulated. It was a 2-edged sword. In the long run it smote both the producer and the consumer.

Why, Mr. President, in 1923, down in the Argentine Republic, cattle dropped down to 3½ cents a pound, $3.50 a hundred, and the cattlemen in that country prevailed upon the Government to work a miracle, to pass a law providing that the packers should not pay less than 4½ cents a pound. The bill was enacted. What happened? The packers closed their plants. They could not pay 4½ cents a pound for cattle on the hoof and compete in the markets of the world with other countries; so they closed their packing plants.

Egypt has attempted this scheme with reference to cotton. She has passed a series of laws, beginning back in 1921. First, she passed a law limiting the acreage; second, she passed a law to buy cotton; and third, she passed a law to lend money on cotton. See how we tread the weary way once again. Three years she bought on a rising market and made a small profit, but the fourth year she lost more on her transactions than she had made during the previous prosperous years.

Take the experience of Cuba with sugar, the experience of Chile with nitrates: They tell the same melancholy tale of disaster and defeat. When any government attempts the impossible, the chronicle is unvarying.

Now, Mr. President, let us come home to the example of the Senator from South Dakota. This example happens to flash into my mind—a very concrete one that will interest him.

Our food control made a "noble experiment" in an attempt to regulate the price of chickens and eggs during the war. It pushed the price of chickens too high and the price of eggs too low. What happened? During one year alone, in one State alone, the State of New York, the number of hens was reduced from 10,000,000 to 8,000,000—2,000,000 hens were sacrificed. Finally, the Food Administration would not even let the farmers sell their culls that were not laying. I cite that as an example of an effort to fix prices in the home market which failed as disastrously as these efforts to fix prices abroad.

Economic laws are not circumscribed by international boundaries. The sooner this Congress learns that and the sooner this country learns that, the sooner we will extricate ourselves from this wilderness of blunders.

Mr. President, I could go on multiplying examples. I have a number here, and will ask to insert extracts in the RECORD in order not to tax the Senate's patience.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD at the end of Mr. GORE's remarks.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. GORE. Even Germany, which had all the power that a government can have, failed as miserably as we failed, just to cite here one instance of her failure. During the war she undertook to fix the prices of fruits and fresh vegetables. She fixed the price too low at first, and the fruits and vegetables rotted in the gardens and the orchards. Next she fixed the price too high, and unripe fruits and vegetables were rushed to market.

I could multiply examples without number, and will attach to my remarks variegated experiments both here and abroad in response to the Senator from South Dakota.

Reverting to this excuse that we did not have power enough, Diocletian, Emperor of Rome, attempted this "noble experiment" about the year 300 A. D. There was some little excuse for him, because he did not have centuries of folly to look back upon and to warn him as to inevitable failure.

Diocletian fixed the price of everything from knitting needles to elephants, and Diocletian had all the power there was—had all the power there is; all political power, all the legislative power, all the civil and military power that can be concentrated into the hands of one human being, was wielded by the undisputed master of the world. Of course, except for a little bootlegging, they did not sell at other prices than those fixed; but they did not produce. You can not make people produce things at less than the cost of production against their will. They revolt.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I know that the farmers are selling their products below the cost of production. It is an unspeakable tragedy; and I know that their debts constitute the most grievous and galling part of their burdens.

Take this example:

A $1,000 Liberty bond issued in 1918 could have been paid off with 5 bales of cotton. To-day it takes 40 bales of cotton to liquidate a $1,000 bond. The cotton farmers of the South—the pity of it is—must dig this cotton out of the ground to liquidate this bond.

When a $1,000 Liberty bond was issued in 1918, 500 bushels of corn would have paid it off. To-day it takes 3,000 bushels of corn to pay a $1,000 Liberty bond.

I do not minimize this burden. I do not minimize the farmer's grievance; but, Mr. President, I know that the farmer can not extricate himself from his trouble by mere crystal gazing, looking to Congress, and hoping that Congress, by some miracle, will rescue him from his disaster. If we could, no one would go farther or faster than I would to help him extricate himself from this disaster. I have tried.

I agree with the Senator from South Dakota. I think that some of us, I think that all of us, ought to paint the thing as we see it for the God of things as they are.

EXHIBIT A

A short account of price fixing on the United States wheat crop during the war and postwar period illustrates the same principles as coal. It was not for lack of funds that the wheat price regulation was not a success. In the short crop year of 1917, $300,000,000 was used; in 1918, the purchase amounted to $884,400,000; in 1919, to $448,900,000. Congress, by an act approved March 4, 1919, made an appropriation effective up to $1,000,000,000, to be certain that the wheat control would be adequately financed. These are large sums when compared with the sum named in the McNary-Haugen plan, but these sums proved necessary to finance the control of only one crop. Price fixing on wheat would work if and when the Government regulated wages and profits and middlemen's margins, also the production of wheat and all other commodities, also the distribution of wheat and all other commodities, also the rationing of consumers to keep consumption coordinated with this type of distribution. If the price is fixed on wheat alone, the farmer can not keep on producing wheat if farm wages rise, or the cost of harvesting machinery and binder twine rises, or his other unregulated costs get out of relationship with his regulated wheat prices. If binder-twine price is regulated, then manila fiber must be regulated. And so on.

During the war the Government fixed the price of wheat from September 1, 1917, to June 30, 1920. When Chicago wheat hit $3.43 a bushel on April 12, 1917, it caused alarm to the Government, which was then anxious to "feed the Belgians" and to keep wheat prices down. On September 1, 1917, the Government fixed the price of wheat at $2.17 a bushel, which was, in effect, pegging the price to prevent a rise. This price, $2.17, continued in effect till July, 1918. Later a minimum price was fixed, but no maximum. So the price, free to rise, rose to $3.50 in December, 1919.

Briefly, the facts are as follows: By December 1, 1917, the farm price of wheat had been reduced from $2.29 to $2.01. Had the price not been fixed, it was obvious that the price would have gone to $3 or higher. When the price was reduced a patriotic appeal was made to "eat less wheat" and to "feed the Belgians." A portion of the public did eat less wheat; another portion began to eat wheat at an increased rate. An unduly large proportion of the crop was consumed by February 1, and yet the year's wheat exports were low. Then compulsion was applied to force the use of wheat substitutes. The Government's March 1 crop report revealed that the farmers had marketed their crop more rapidly than usual, that consumption had been too rapid, and hence stocks on hand were too low. Consumers then turned to rye, and the farm price of rye jumped from $1.75 in February to $2.35 in April. Rules were promulgated requiring substitutes for rye, and in June the farm price of rye dropped back to $1.88. The price of wheat was fixed, and later flour, and later bread.

The price of bran was fixed in the spring of 1918. The fixed price was ineffective in many cases. By combination sales and by mixing other feeds a price higher than the "regular" price was often charged. The price regulation had different effects on distribution in different sections of the country. The cost to farmers in the East was actually made higher and to the farmers in the West lower. When wheat price fixing began the New England farmer was paying $39.48 for his bran; but when bran prices were once controlled he had to pay $48.58 for his bran, while wheat prices had only advanced 10 cents. At this rate it was cheaper to eat the bran himself and give the wheat to his cows.

Under the first year of wheat-price fixing the farmers found the price kept down, while the price of wheat binders, not being fixed, rose so high that a farmer could not afford to sell his wheat and buy a new binder. The price of binder twine was not fixed, so it rose to new high levels. Farm wages were not fixed, so the farmer found it hard to sell cheap wheat to hire dear labor.

To control wheat prices successfully, therefore, the Government would have had to control the price of the things which the farmer needs for producing wheat, such as (1) farm labor, (2) binders, (3) binder twine, and so on and on. But, to control binder-twine price, for instance, the Government would have to fix the price of sisal in Yucatan. And to control the price of sisal it would have to fix the price of the labor that produced the sisal in Yucatan, also the rent of lands there, also the transportation costs from Yucatan to the United States. In short, the Government would have had an endless job of price fixing, a sort of endless chain. The fact is, when the Government starts price fixing, it starts something which it can not finish.

Another interesting experience in price fixing by our Government was that relating to eggs and poultry. The price was fixed at which cold-storage eggs could be sold. The price was set too low. This kept the price of fresh eggs down, because a large portion of fresh eggs are bought to go into cold storage. But as the price of eggs was going down, the price of poultry feeds was going up, particularly corn, the price of which was not fixed. The farmer could not afford to keep expensive hens and sell cheap eggs. So the hens were slaughtered. In New York State alone 2,000,000 hens were slaughtered in one year (the State census reported 10,738,960 hens in April, 1917, and only 8,907,644 in February, 1918). The Government then promulgated a rule prohibiting the sale of hens, hoping thereby to keep up the number of hens. But there was no law to compel the farmers to produce chickens, and hence the number of chickens fell off, egg production declined sharply, the surplus became a deficit, and egg prices soared to new high levels. Instead of stabilizing the industry, price fixing threw it completely out of gear and brought about a period of violent seesawing in profits and prices.

Our experience in price fixing with coal is both interesting and instructive. Coal is like agriculture in certain major respects—it is a fundamental necessity in the business life of the Nation; it is produced by many thousands of scattered independent and competing units. A group of Government experts known as the Fuel Administration was put in charge of the bituminous-coal industry, and later of the anthracite. The first move of the Fuel Administration was to change the coal price level—i. e., to lower it. Next it was necessary to deal with the jobbers and reduce their profits. And the next step was to regulate the retailers and keep down their profits. In other words, the price of coal was the problem dealt with, not the more important question of adequate production and adequate distribution to meet consumers' legitimate demands. Price (open competitive price) is the best barometer to production and consumption conditions. When a governmental authority regulates price arbitrarily it breaks this barometer and has no instrument to use in place of it. Hence the certainty of upsetting either production or consumption, or both, by such unoriented price fixing. It is like trying to navigate without barometer or chart or compass. Note what happened to coal:

"The Fuel Administration in its handling of the coal situation during the first half of 1917 committed the mistake of considering the problem largely from one angle only, that of price. The sharp advance in price was attributed almost solely to exorbitant profits made by coal-mine owners and coal dealers; the remedy was sought in price fixing and in the establishment of margins. Not until shipments to Europe of food and munitions came to a standstill because of lack of coal at the seaboard terminals, and not until the whole industrial war program of the country seemed to be on the point of collapse, did the question of production and distribution of coal assume the importance it should have had from the very beginning.

"No adequate provisions were made during the summer and fall of 1917 to stimulate the maximum output and early wide distribution. Consumers were holding off in the expectation of a fall in price, and they were encouraged in their attitude by the statements issued by the Fuel Administrator.

"Things went from bad to worse during that part of the year when reserves should have been accumulated by the users of coal. In the week of August 13 production reached its lowest point of the year.

"An unexpected climax came on January 16, 1918, when the Fuel Administrator issued one of the most drastic Government regulations brought about by the war. The order directed that all factories east of the Mississippi River be shut down for five days beginning January 18, 1918. The order involved over 85 per cent of the country's steam plants used for manufacturing. There was no advance notice of such an order and no opportunity to make preparation. In addition to the shutting down of factories, a request was made that for 10 weeks on Monday offices, factories, and stores, except drug and food stores, use only such fuel as was necessary to prevent damage."

This extended quotation gives a general picture of conditions as they were. The Fuel Administrator himself described the situation as follows:

"A winter of greater severity than the country had known for 50 years doubled the domestic consumption of coal. The railroads were blocked for days at a time, and while consumers were near the end of their supplies mines stood idle because of lack of cars. A marked slowing up of the work of the most essential war industries took place. Pig-iron production was cut in two. Mills working on ship plates dropped to 30 per cent capacity. Meanwhile, in the harbors of the country hundreds of vessels loaded with supplies for the Allies and the American soldiers were awaiting bunker coal, and all efforts to provide a supply proved futile."

Unfortunately, at this time the railroads were also under Government control, and there was lack of coordination between the Fuel Administration and the Railroad Administration. Price fixing in bituminous coal was made more difficult by the decentralization of the industry, and because many of the small mines, like the poor farms, are high-cost producers. Some of these could not be profitably operated on the price as first fixed; they shut down. Later the price was raised, but many laborers by that time had quit the coal fields to work in factories paying higher wages and not regulated by the Government.

The labor situation in coal mining, both bituminous and anthracite, became acute.

"With regard to the labor situation there was a lack of coordination between the Fuel Administration and the War Department. The number of laborers working in the anthracite mines decreased from 177,000 in 1916 to 153,534 in 1917. The Fuel Administrator had been permitting the depletion of unreplaceable labor, both skilled and unskilled, without raising his voice against it. Thousands of men left the coal fields for more lucrative employment. In the bituminous mines the trouble had been largely due not to shortage of labor but to the lack of locomotives and cars for the haulage of coal away from the mines. The inadequacy of transportation facilities checked production. It never rose sufficiently to meet the needs of the Nation at war.

"Just before the conclusion of the armistice the Fuel Administration admitted that it was certain that the enormous demands for fuel could not be fully met by production. On February 1, 1919, the Fuel Administration discontinued all price control and much of the supervision over distribution of coal, coke, oil, and natural gas. With the passing of control over coal, most of the activities of the Fuel Administration ceased." (United States Department of Labor, Monthly Labor Review, December, 1918, pp. 164–167. There is one country famous for its superdevelopment in administrative efficiency, namely, Germany. This country, during the early years of the war, gave as thorough a trial to regulating food supplies as any modern country has ever done. But in spite of the efficiency of the administrative machinery, the conflict with simple economic laws was too much for the Government, and hence these honestly and ably administered efforts failed. The story of these efforts has been printed in official Government sources.

An account of the German experience, from which the following excerpts are taken, is printed in the Monthly Review of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Washington, D. C., May, 1917.

"The recommendations of the Eltzbacher commission for the reduction of swine and cattle were carried out during the first four months of 1915. Approximately one-third of the swine and 10 per cent of the milch cows—supposedly about a million and a half—were killed. About the time when the killing of the swine was under way, in March, an inventory of the potato stocks led to the official statement that these were low. Since the potato in Germany was one of the staple swine feeds, it was decided to kill rather more than the denominated number of swine in order to meet the loss in potatoes. Two months later another potato inventory was taken, revealing the fact that the previous inventory had been in error and that the killing of the additional swine had been entirely unnecessary, since the potatoes were available, and these potatoes were thrown upon the market at a huge loss in price and to a large extent underwent decomposition.

"No oxen were killed, and the killing of calves was not in excess of the usual number; the slaughter did not extend to sheep and goats, which, on the contrary, were conserved with foresight. The presence of such huge amounts of meat upon the market unquestionably resulted in increased consumption during the first six months of 1915. According to the plan, by far the largest portion of the meats thus obtained was to be conserved for future use, and should have represented a very large stock of conserved meat. The processes of conservation were, however, carried out very inefficiently, with the result that a large portion of this meat underwent decomposition and became a complete loss. * * *

"In the autumn of 1915, within six months after one-third of the swine and a million and a quarter of milch cows had been killed, two meatless days (Tuesday and Friday) and two fatless days (Monday and Thursday) were introduced by decree. Maximum prices were decreed for retail sales, but without correlation and usually without result.

"Gradually the lines became drawn between cities and industrial districts, on the one hand, and the country districts, on the other. To protect themselves, the country districts prohibited export. The authorities attempted, in a half-hearted manner, to oppose such regulations and to reestablish the flow of foodstuffs in the channels of trade by increasing the maximum prices. A maximum price, once established, became, of course, the only price. As opposed to the regulations of the cities and of the imperial authorities, the regulations of the smaller districts were naturally more effective. Restrictive regulations spread over the entire land, each community looking out for its own interests, and it was soon apparent that the industrial cities were at a disadvantage.

"ESTABLISHMENT OF THE WAR NUTRITION OFFICE

"Control over the food supply of the empire was, up to June, 1916, vested in the imperial department of the interior (Reichsamt des Innern), of which von Delbrück was secretary. Dissatisfaction with the measures taken by this department became general during the second year of the war.

"The worst mistake of the Delbrück régime was in trying to regulate the sale and use of food without knowing how much food existed. The food-card system in particular evoked the severest criticism, this criticism being caused not so much by the rationing of food as by the long waiting in front of shops for the sale of foodstuffs. The food cards, with the exception of the bread cards, did not carry any guarantee, but merely gave the holder the right to stand in line for hours and take the chances. When the supply for the day was exhausted the remaining shoppers were turned away. Disturbances of the peace were frequent, and it was felt as a grievous injustice that by this waiting in front of shops the women were withheld from household duties for hours.

"When Delbrück resigned a separate department, called the war nutrition office, was created directly under the chancellor. The president of this office was given absolute police powers under martial law, with a standing committee of experts representing the producers, transporters, middlemen, consumers, and the army. The new system was installed on June 1, 1916, with Adolph von Batocki as president of the war nutrition office. * * *

"CONTROL OF THE POTATO CROP

"Late in January, 1916, scarcity of potatoes developed in the cities. An inventory showed that only 18,000,000 tons remained, from which the seed had still to be reserved, leaving only 11,000,000 tons to last for six months. Thereupon potato cards were introduced, and the attempt was made to limit the feeding of potatoes to livestock. When the authorities determined to uncover and seize the stocks of stored potatoes, unexpected losses by decomposition became apparent. Von Batocki, on assuming office in June, 1916, promptly prohibited any feeding of potatoes to livestock. The potato cards introduced earlier in the year were not guaranteed, and in the large cities the intake for each person during the spring months was often as low as a quarter of a pound a day. Then the crop of summer potatoes came upon the market with a rush, as the maximum prices were high and scaled downward to increase the offerings. Early in August the cities were flooded with potatoes in carload lots. The poor, however, because of the announcement that prices were scaled to fall, bought only from hand to mouth. As a result, thousands of tons decomposed and were lost. Nevertheless, even at this time the potato card and the prohibition of feeding to swine were not suspended. Two weeks later the cities were again empty of potatoes. The growers had ceased to harvest potatoes when the prices fell; they were engaged in the harvesting of grain, and the urban population had to wait for regular rations of potatoes until the digging of potatoes could again be resumed. * * *

"MEASURES RELATING TO THE PRODUCTION AND SALE OF VEGETABLES AND FRUIT

"The retail prices for fruit reached unheard-of heights during the summer of 1916. The growers' prices were high, in extenuation of which the high cost of fertilizer, cultivation, picking, and packing was adduced. The maximum prices first set were low. Then the growers refused to pick. The prices were raised, and thereupon green fruit was sent to the market. The people were encouraged to put up fruit by sterilization by heat and with saccharine; but the housewives were not inclined to experimentation. Thereupon the war nutrition office confiscated the entire crop of early apples and plums, supplied the sugar, and had them converted into jams."

Summary: Here is given at length the experience of one of the most efficiently administered governments in the world in regulating the supply and demand and the price barometer of agricultural products. It failed, as such efforts must ever fail.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the eloquent statements of the Senator from Oklahoma make a beautiful picture on paper, but they are so far from the real facts of the situation as logical conclusions that I can not let them stand without a word of reply.

He has given quite an accurate account of the passage of the Democratic bills in 1919, but the first Democratic price-fixing bill was passed in 1917. He has said to us that the price fixing of those bills lost the farmers a billion dollars during the war. He has left out the most positive proof to the contrary, and that is that the first bill, passed on the 10th of August, 1917, was upon this information in the hands of the President of the United States, that England, France, and Italy had combined and appointed one buyer to buy all their wheat, and had decided to bid $1.50 a bushel, No. 1 northern, Chicago. They were all the bidders we had, because we were at war then with Germany and Austria, and could not sell them wheat. The President recommended the first law in order to get the farmers a better price for wheat than this bid which the foreign combination had decided to make. That law was passed on the 10th of August, 1917, and four days later the Farm Board was appointed by President Wilson. Sixteen days later the Farm Board completed its deliberations, and on the 30th of August fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel, No. 1 northern, Chicago, raising the foreign bid by 70 cents a bushel. So, instead of a loss on that wheat, we had a gain, a profit, of 70 cents a bushel, which the farmers of the United States would not have received but for the price-fixing law. Instead of that law being a failure, it was a success, and maintained the price as long as the Wheat Corporation lasted.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has gone into an eloquent description of this depression, but what did cause it? Did the Government have anything to do with it? Yes. The first start was when the Government of the United States loaned $11,000,000,000 of the American people's money to foreign governments, where it can not be repaid.

Then along came the Esch-Cummins railroad law and raised the rates on agriculture by 60 per cent, and that added to the burdens of agriculture. Then along came the deflation policy of 1920, and deflated agriculture in the whole sum of $32,000,000,000. Under laws and under administrations of laws all these things were done.

Then along came the tariff law; and tariffs are price-fixing devices, and they are price-fixing devices that work. They raise the price levels of American industrial products. They fix it so that the farmer must pay a price fixed at the factory without foreign competition.

Then there are the patent laws. They are price-fixing devices and permit an absolute monopoly. They always succeed, so far as the individual article upon which they are placed is concerned.

Then along with that the great corporations, under corporation laws, got the economic power to go out and fix prices both ways. Those things have brought on this agricultural depression, and all of this was the result of laws or of the administration of laws.

Mr. President, since it is laws and their administration that put agriculture down, it is laws that must bring agriculture up. Talk about the law of supply and demand; there is no such thing as the law of supply and demand. It ends at the border of every country in the world. Prices are fixed by government regulation all over the world; and so far as a country is concerned, it has the power to control the prices in the country.

Let me review the instances cited by the eloquent Senator from Oklahoma. He mentioned Brazilian coffee. How much of that Brazilian coffee is an export proposition? Probably 95 per cent of it. Probably not 5 per cent of it is used in Brazil. Of course, Brazil, as said by the Senator from South Dakota, can not control the price outside of her own country.

Then the Senator from Oklahoma mentioned rubber. Again, what portion of the rubber of the world is an export proposition? Probably more than 95 per cent of rubber must go to foreign countries. Yet the Senator cites that as a parallel for the control of domestic markets.

Then comes silk, produced in Japan. I have no idea what the percentage is, how Japan depends on the foreign markets for the sale of her silk products.

Then comes the cotton in Egypt, and certainly Egypt depends upon foreign markets for her cotton price. Then Chilean nitrates, nearly all of which are foreign exports. Then comes sugar in Cuba. Nearly all of that is foreign export.

How about American products? Cotton is the one which has the big surplus, a little over 50 per cent. Wheat has about 20 per cent, corn has less than 1 per cent, oats has less than 1 per cent, and livestock products have about 7 or 8 per cent. All together the export of American products is less than 10 per cent.

I do not claim that we can control the price of that 10 per cent that goes abroad, but I do contend that we can, under a proper governmental set-up, with proper funds, and proper authority, control the price of the 90 per cent used at home. In the case of corn and oats it is 99 per cent, and of livestock products 92 or 93 per cent. That would be done with the proper arrangements and authorities and laws. There is no comparison, in that portion of the proposition, with any one of the items cited by the Senator from Oklahoma.

When we come to sell the exportable surplus of these products we will have to take what the world market can or will pay us at the time. But the fact is that in food products, and even in cotton, there has been a world demand in every 7-year period of world history. There has never been a 7-year period when it was not all demanded and all used up.

So it becomes a question of long-time financing.

In the case of wheat, when the price was fixed at $2.20 a bushel, the Wheat Corporation bid that price for all the wheat that was offered. I fully agree with the Senator's criticism of the Farm Board in its operation. It made no such bid for wheat or cotton or for any other surplus product. It simply went into the gambling business and gambled on the board of trade and in the cotton exchange, and Mr. Milnor, the $50,000-a-year expert in charge of wheat, testified that on the same day the Stabilization Corporation, of which he was general manager, under the Farm Board, and the National Marketing Corporation, of which he was also general manager—one of them would be buying wheat and the other would be selling wheat on the board of trade the same day.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. I rise just to bring out this point, that the Farm Board was not trying to stabilize the American market, they were trying to stabilize the world market, because they were in effect bidding on a world market. In other words, they were carrying out the spirit of the law—our law—which set out professedly to raise the price of wheat in the world, instead of limiting themselves to raising it on that part of the product consumed at home. Is that right?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator's observation is correct. I think it worked out in that way. Although perhaps that might not have been their specific purpose, that was the result.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator will agree with me that the present farm law as adminstered makes no distinction between a domestic market and a world market.

Mr. BROOKHART. Not as much as it ought to.

Mr. NORBECK. It does not segregate the exportable surplus. Is that right?

Mr. BROOKHART. Not specifically; but I think the power is there.

Mr. NORBECK. But they are not doing it, and they said they were not going to do it, said that before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the presence of the Senator and me.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is correct.

The Senator from Oklahoma says that the raising of prices restricts consumption and increases production. That might be true as a general proposition, where there is an unlimited field for production and a limited field for consumption, but I want to apply that rule to American farm products.

I have a scientific analysis of agriculture in the United States since 1900, made by the National Industrial Conference Board. I think there is no doubt about its soundness, about its thoroughness, and about its final conclusions. This analysis shows that on the whole agricultural production is declining and has been declining steadily since 1900. In other words, the American population is growing faster than agricultural production, so that there is no danger in the United States of any overstimulated production through stimulation of prices. In fact, if the present trend continues, and it can not otherwise than continue, in 25 or 30 years we will not have much agricultural surplus in the United States except of cotton. That probably will remain a big surplus for many years, but all these other staple products are gradually declining year after year, and cotton likewise.

Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator from Oklahoma says, that the production of wheat was stimulated during the war, but it was at the expense of pasture and livestock, and the general agricultural production, even under the stimulus of war and the high prices of war, was not increased to any marked degree among the 12 principal agricultural products of the United States.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The acreage of wheat was increased, but it was not because of the fixing of the price. It was because the farmers were urged to raise wheat to save the boys who had gone from the United States across the water in the war. It was to "Win the war," which was the slogan adopted, and the farmer who would not increase his acreage of wheat was held to be unpatriotic. That is the reason why the acreage of wheat was increased.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is why; and some of the boys are down here now without a penny or a home, or without anything to eat or any bread, although we have more wheat than we know what to do with at the same time.

As to the production of wheat, I think the increase was about 18,000,000 acres, due to the appeal to patriotism, and if you want to charge it up somewhat to price, although the price, $2.20 and $2.26, was not an exceedingly high price. If it had not been for the combination of England, France, and Italy to bid it down to $1.50, the farmers probably would have gotten a good deal better than the price fixed by the Government. Many farmers have criticized that Government action, because they said they would have gotten three or four dollars a bushel for their wheat, instead of $2.26.

In 1916, however, the farmers got on an average $1.51 for their wheat, and the speculators sold it for as high as $3.25, and the price of flour was fixed for the public on the basis of $3.25, but the Government price fixing of 1917, 1918, and 1919 cut out all of that speculation, and really reduced the profits and put the board of trade entirely out of business. It did not sell a bushel of wheat on futures after the first bid was made in 1917.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Government of the United States owes it to agriculture to restore it to a normal condition. I am sure that it is these various enactments of the Government of the United States which have put agriculture down. There is no occasion for a depression in the United States. We were profiteers out of the war. The $11,000,000,000 we loaned to foreign countries was out of war profits. Then private parties loaned from fifteen to thirty billion dollars more. The Senator from Utah says our foreign loans and advancements amount to a total of $45,000,000,000 now. If that be true, of course that took a vast fraction of our resources abroad, and a great fraction of that will not be returned.

Of course, that had a tendency to put us in a depression, but agriculture was stricken down in 1920. The railroad law started it first and then the deflation policy followed next. There never was such a panic in farm prices in all history as began late in 1920 and continued through 1921. There never has been any substantial revival since. Prices have been too low on an index basis. Other business revived in 1922 and went into a gigantic inflation and boom in 1929. Then the great bubble burst and that hit agriculture again and sent it down still deeper into the depression.

It is not the fault of agriculture. It is not overproduction that did these things. The entire agricultural surplus could have been destroyed and if we would have gotten the cost of production price for the remainder, agriculture would have been fairly prosperous. But this little surplus being first sold in the domestic market, not being separated or segregated as every other business does its surplus in the United States, it floods the market and that flood breaks down the agricultural tariff protection and those tariff rates are mere scraps of paper. They do not protect the cost-of-production price of the farmer. Being broken down the flood moves over into the free-trade markets of the world. The prices fixed are cabled back to the board of trade or the cotton exchange or the produce exchange, and then the price of our products is fixed the same, less freight and expense of reaching the foreign market.

It is the tariff law that fixes that situation, a price-fixing device that has raised the American price far above the general world's level of such prices. While it raises the prices for what the farmer must buy, it leaves him to take the price fixed by the sale of his surplus in the free-trade markets of the world.

The industries that have tariff protection also have surplus production. In 1929 they had $2,500,000,000, but they are financed and every one of them separates the surplus from the domestic market. They take out the surplus and ship it abroad and get the best price they can, and so charge a less profit than they charge the people of the United States. All of that arrangement was done under the banking system created by the laws of the United States and of the various States, together with the big Federal reserve system overhead.

Therefore I say that the Government owes it to agriculture to restore this prosperity, and I say that general prosperity can not return until agricultural prosperity is restored. In the last 50 years we have had eight major depressions. What brought us out of all of them up to 1920? It was agriculture every time, because the farmers got their land at a low price of $1.25 from the Government; and the railroads got it for nothing and sold it to the farmers for $8 or $10; but even then the price of land continued to rise until 1920, and that gave agriculture a buying power in part, at least, and kept agricultural credit good. Agriculture through those means was able to pull us out of all the other depressions. But since 1920 land values have turned backward, and they are now back lower than they have ever been in my time. I can not remember such prices as we have now. The best farms in the best States in the Union are selling at a good deal less than the buildings on the farms cost. Agriculture has neither buying power nor credit. Agriculture is not helping to lift us out of this depression.

Who is it that has the power and the resources to take charge of the agricultural surpluses and separate and segregate them from the domestic market? There is just one institution I know of that has the power, and that is the Government of the United States. The great financial group do not intend to do it. There were 173 of those big combinations that had greater profits in 1931 than at any time in their history. They discharged thousands of their men, and under that situation we can not depend on them. Last year, the deepest year of the depression, we had a national income, according to the National Industrial Conference Board, of over $60,000,000,000. That is $2,500 for every average family in the United States even in a year of depression.

In 1930 it was over $70,000,000,000, and in 1929 it was over $90,000,000,000. So we have to-day in this country an income all the time sufficient to maintain a general level of prosperity, if it had been distributed in a general way. But under the laws of special privileges and under the administration of those laws it has been taken away from agriculture and taken away from labor, labor has been discharged by the millions, and all the time that has produced the inequalities which are brought about to drive us down deeper and deeper into the depression. Nobody has shown me any way to climb out except for the Government to relieve agriculture and labor, the two things that must be prosperous if we are to save our civilization.

We have enacted our Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, and that is a bolshevistic act, too. That is a Government institution itself. It puts the Government in business. It is loaning money to the railroads, to the banks, to the insurance companies, and to other special classes. But it has lowered the price of farm products. It has not increased them because it begins at the wrong place. What about the banks that have received loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? While hogs sell at $2.55 a hundred and corn at 23 cents a bushel and cotton at 4 cents a pound, they will not be able to pay those loans when due; and, instead of the loans taking us out of the depression, they are driving us deeper into the depression.

No; the Government does not hesitate to do things when it is the big financial crowd that wants them done. Then there is none of this argument that it is unscientific or uneconomic and that we can not do it by legislation. They simply walk in and bill No. 1 in the Senate of the United States was for $2,000,000,000—$500,000,000 directly out of the Treasury and $1,500,000,000 a liability of the Treasury—to put the Government into business for the big banks of the country, leaving agriculture and labor struggling along without semblance of relief.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to have read into the RECORD at this place the guaranteed price of wheat in certain European countries in 1917, as I have indicated in the RECORD, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COHEN in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 11, 1919, at page 3109, as follows:

When interrupted I was enumerating the guaranteed price for wheat in various countries. The guaranteed price in Brazil for the present year is $2.16 per bushel; in Switzerland it is $3.18; in Holland it is $3.30; in France it is $3.84; in Norway it is $4.09; in Italy it is $4.44 for hard wheat and $3.96 for soft wheat. It is reasonable to assume that these generous prices will tempt a considerable acreage in the several countries mentioned.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] attaches too much importance to the reports or, I might say, rumor that there was a combination on the part of certain European countries to reduce or fix the price of wheat in this country at $1.50 a bushel in 1917. The food control law was approved on August 10, 1917. I believe Mr. Hoover was appointed Food Administrator the next day. During that week No. 1 northern wheat sold in Chicago at $3 a bushel and No. 2 hard winter wheat sold in Chicago at around $2.50 or $2.60 a bushel.

That week the food control bill passed Congress. On September 1, upon the recommendation of his committee, the Food Administrator fixed the price at $2.20. Wheat, of course, went down from $3 to $2.20 a bushel and the producers of northern wheat or spring wheat in the Dakotas lost 80 cents a bushel on their wheat. The winter-wheat States lost from 40 to 50 or 60 cents a bushel on wheat which they marketed.

I think I have an authority on this point which will convince the Senator from Iowa. Either on the 20th or 22d day of August, 1920, Mr. Hoover, who administered that law as Food Administrator, delivered an address in Minneapolis to the millers of that city, in which he said:

But for your cooperation in the enforcement of this wheat and flour control act, wheat might have sold at $6 a bushel and flour might have sold at $30 a barrel.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] once quoted in this Chamber Mr. Hoover as saying on that occasion that "but for his interference and their interference in holding down the price of bread there would have been industrial disturbances and the streets might have run red with blood." I may say that I have never been able in checking the reports of that speech to find that language, but it does stand in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD quoted by the Senator from North Dakota, and I am certain that he had newspaper authority at least for the quotation when it was made.

Only one other point—an instance which I promised a few moments ago—France has fixed the price of wheat. She consumes more than she produces. She has a tariff on wheat of $1.43 per hundred pounds. She fixes the price around $1.70 and obliges the sale and purchase of bread upon a corresponding basis. That is a different situation, a deficit country instead of a surplus country. Forces can be brought into play that can arbitrarily control prices, and the payment of such prices—entailing certain economic consequences. We are a surplus country with reference to wheat and cotton, and that surplus with us becomes almost an unsolvable problem. I offered at least a partial solution, but it was not accepted.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, with reference to the imaginary communication from Mr. Hoover, I have his letter to President Wilson written on the 10th of July, 1917, asking for the establishment of the food administration and the wheat corporation. In that official communication he said that "England, France, and Italy have combined together and decided to bid $1.50 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, Chicago, and they are all the bidders we have in this war time, and the farmers can not afford to produce wheat at that price." That was the official communication upon which the President acted in recommending the law and getting it passed.

In that same letter he said the farmers got $1.51, on the average, for their wheat in 1916, and the speculators sold it as high as $3.25, and "we must stop that speculation." I can not imagine that that letter was written officially to the President, and then this other speech was actually made in this very fantastic form over in Minneapolis. I certainly would follow the text of the letter upon that matter.

The Senator quoted the price of wheat in France and Germany and other countries where the price is controlled as all right. They are controlling the price for their own farmers right now in that way because they do not produce as much wheat as they use. That makes it easier to control. We can control the price of the wheat we use in exactly the same way that France and Germany now control the price in their countries. We may have a loss on the surplus when we sell it abroad; but if we do, we shall have to stand that loss. Two ways have been proposed of meeting that loss. One is the equalization fee, which is a tax on the farmer, and the other, which is the one I want to use, is the debenture paid out of the Treasury of the United States. After we have paid out of the Treasury so many debentures to other industries, including the railroads, I think we can afford to do as much for the farmers.

As to the controlled prices during the war, they were controlled in France and Germany better for their own farmers than they were in the United States. They had us in such a position that they were the only bidders for wheat, and that is why they could enforce a bid for our wheat unless we had a governmental set-up with funds enough and authority enough to handle the surplus.

Congress gave Mr. Hoover $550,000,000 to buy surplus wheat in the first instance in 1917, and it authorized him to borrow more if he needed it. He needed $385,000,000 more, and borrowed that, and with the $150,000,000 he bought $535,000,000 worth of wheat. Then, at the end of 1919 when all the surplus had finally been disposed of, the price had gone up because of the world shortage, and they got all their money back and got $59,000,000 profit on the whole wheat transaction in three years, which was turned into the United States Treasury.

I do not claim that in peace time and in all times we would have a profit such as that in handling the surplus, but the Chairman of the Federal Farm Board testified that we would have a profit on some of it that might reduce our losses at various times because of world conditions cutting down the world supply. Under that situation it is perfectly sound and perfectly logical that if we are going to maintain this artificial tariff protection for the industries, then we must make the farmers' tariff rates effective also.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, since the Senator from Iowa has mentioned it, I recall the law to which he refers. I may also say that I remember James Whitcomb Riley's little poem, "The goblins will get you if you don't watch out."

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am not particularly interested in the question whether some one was right or wrong in the fixing of the wheat price during the war. There seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether it was done to help win the war, but the farmers were told they would have to raise more wheat in order to win the war, and they raised it. However, no Senator during this long debate has challenged the outstanding fact that when the price of wheat was fixed by the Government it was fixed downward and not upward. The Senator from Oklahoma, in my judgment, is right in saying that that kind of price fixing cost the farmers of his State and other States hundreds of millions of dollars. Certainly, I can agree with him that certain kinds of price fixing are very bad and very unfair and very dangerous. But, Mr. President, the farmers would have no claim for relief except for the inequality to which they are subjected caused by the interference with economic law for the benefit of others. If the farmer is getting an unjust deal, it is because somebody else has been given the long end; it is because price fixing has been the rule, and it has been used against him; it is because the earnings that should have gone to him have gone to others; it is because strong organizations and strong interests have come to Congress here to get special favors at the expense of the farmers. Yet when it is suggested that something be done to equalize conditions we are told that we must not interfere with economic law, and the whole cause of the trouble is interference with economic law.

The Senator from Oklahoma and I are not far apart. He stated that it is futile to attempt to fix the price of a world-wide commodity which is not consumed to any great extent at home. I fully agree with him as to that. I made that argument on this floor several years ago when the farm marketing bill was up. I fought a similar bill six years ago; I thought it was a futile thing to appropriate any money of the Government to try to fix the price of wheat in Liverpool; I thought it was a folly; I thought it was the most foolish thing that I had ever heard of being done in Congress. I said then that it would operate to the disadvantage of the farmers, and everyone admits now that it has. So the Senator from Oklahoma and I are not far apart as to that. This bill, however, does not attempt to do any such thing. It attempts, Mr. President, to get away from that thing which we are told is wrong. It attempts to get away from that thing which is evil and which has worked to the farmers' disadvantage. It attempts to get away from that thing which has upset our whole economics and has stopped the wheels of the factories and threatened the welfare of the entire country.

No, Mr. President; I do not feel that it is any answer to say that this depression is world-wide and that it is impossible to deal with the depression as such. That may be altogether too true; but we overlook the fact that the inequality between the farmer and the others did not come with this world depression. It came many, many years before. It helped to bring on the world depression. Everyone admits now that it helped bring on the depression and the disaster within the United States, and we are a part of the world.

We hear a great deal of complaint about others trying to live on a thousand-dollar salary; we have heard it a hundred times on this floor, and it is a fact that a good standard of living can not be maintained on ten or twelve hundred dollars a year; but why, then, is it insisted that the farmer should maintain himself and his family on one-fourth as much? Why do we ignore the fact that we can not give somebody a dollar without taking it away from some one else? We have, during the present session, voted repeatedly to tax the farmer and give it to some one else. That is interfering with economic law; that is the kind of interference against which I am protesting; that is the interference which struck agriculture down; that is the interference that stopped the wheels of the factory; that is the interference that broke down the value of property; that is the interference that made the banks weak; that is the interference that threatens to bring on financial disaster to the Nation. It is the interference with economic laws, if you please, that has brought this condition upon us; and we have very largely brought it upon ourselves.

What is the situation now? I have a letter from a farmer in South Dakota, a portion of which I will read. He says:

In about three weeks I will harvest 80 acres of rye. It will probably yield 15 bushels to the acre.

Which is a very satisfactory crop.

It will probably sell in Chicago or Milwaukee to-day for 32 cents or 33 cents. The freight and commission will be 17½ cents per bushel, thrashing 5 cents, other expenses 3 cents, or net 7 cents to me.

Seven times 15 amounts to $1.05 an acre, and that is not allowing for his taxes, that is not allowing for his labor, that is not allowing for interest on his mortgage, that is not allowing for the cost of planting; Mr. President, it is not even allowing for the cost of seed. Yet that is the value of a good crop of 1932. So not only does he work for nothing, but in reality he pays for the privilege of farming. He goes on to say that if he would leave the crop in the field he would be money ahead, because he owes for the seed and there is a mortgage on it for the seed. That, Mr. President, is the state of agriculture.

We hear much about overproduction, and still the fact is unchallenged that the increased production of wheat does not equal the increase in our population; the fact stands unchallenged that we are producing less wheat per man, woman, and child than we did 10, 20, or 30 years ago.

Some one may say we are consuming less per capita and that is why we are exporting more. Mr. President, the best answer to that is to take the export figures and see whether we have been exporting more. They show that we have actually been exporting less, even leaving out the last two years, during which the Farm Board put wheat in the warehouses instead of marketing it in an orderly way as it should have done.

I quite agree that price fixing is a dangerous thing, and certainly I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma that if the price be fixed too high it will increase the output of the commodity. But why use that as an argument against the pending bill, when the pending bill does not provide that there shall be a profit on commodities produced on the farm, but only that the price shall be established at the cost of production? Some of the cases which have been cited are not parallel. That is true of the argument as to coffee; it is true of the argument as to rubber; it is true of the argument as to silk. They come in a different class entirely, and therefore the argument based on those commodities does not bear upon this question.

Mr. President, agriculture has gone through its disaster, and now there is not much left of it. The agricultural disaster has spread out over the Nation. If the rest of the country likes it, if they like stopping the factories and increasing unemployment which the depression of agriculture has brought about, let it keep right on.

I know that some may say by fixing the price of wheat the price of food will be increased. They forget the fact that the farmer gets less than 1 cent out of every loaf of bread and generally gets about one-half a cent. They forget the fact, as the Senator from Oklahoma so well stated, that with the price of wheat in France at $1.70 a bushel, five times as much as it is here, a loaf of bread sells in France for the same price as it sells for here, or even at a less price than here, because here we are robbed by the middlemen. Yet when there is any legislation brought on this floor the time is devoted to faultfinding instead of devoted to finding a way out of the difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. HOWELL asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Keyes	Shipstead
Austin	Dale	King	Shortridge
Bankhead	Davis	La Follette	Smoot
Barbour	Dill	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McNary	Townsend
Bratton	George	Metcalf	Trammell
Brookhart	Glass	Moses	Tydings
Broussard	Glenn	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Norbeck	Wagner
Byrnes	Gore	Norris	Walcott,
Capper	Hale	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Cohen	Howell	Reed	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White
Coolidge	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Copeland	Kean	Schall
Costigan	Kendrick	Sheppard

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. HULL] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] are necessarily detained, attending the funeral of the late Representative ESLICK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to recommit the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah and the other Senators who have taken part in this discussion if it is possible for us to have unanimous consent, in the event this motion to recommit is withdrawn, for a limit on debate on any amendment or on the bill itself, so that we may get it out of the way some time soon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. McNARY. The question now before the Senate is the motion to recommit, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. That should be disposed of, and I think we are ready for a vote.

Mr. ASHURST (and other Senators). Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONNALLY (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who is necessarily absent. I find, however, that my pair, if present, would vote as I desire to vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] and withhold my vote. If the Senator from South Dakota were present, I understand that he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. I am advised, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is absent from the city. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is necessarily absent on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

The junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] are also necessarily detained on official business.

The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily out of the city.

The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is also out of the city. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] in attendance on the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—38

Ashurst	Coolidge	King	Townsend
Austin	Couzens	Lewis	Tydings
Bankhead	Dale	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Barbour	George	Moses	Wagner
Borah	Glass	Oddie	Walcott
Broussard	Goldsborough	Patterson	Walsh, Mass.
Bulkley	Hale	Reed	Watson
Byrnes	Hebert	Robinson, Ark.	White
Carey	Kendrick	Shortridge
Cohen	Keyes	Smoot

NAYS—28

Blaine	Fletcher	McNary	Shipstead
Bratton	Frazier	Neely	Steiwer
Brookhart	Harrison	Norbeck	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Howell	Norris	Thomas, Okla.
Caraway	Johnson	Nye	Trammell
Costigan	La Follette	Schall	Walsh, Mont.
Dill	McGill	Sheppard	Wheeler

NOT VOTING—30

Bailey	Davis	Hayden	Pittman
Barkley	Dickinson	Hull	Robinson, Ind.
Bingham	Fess	Jones	Smith
Black	Glenn	Kean	Stephens
Bulow	Gore	Logan	Swanson
Connally	Hastings	Long	Waterman
Copeland	Hatfield	McKellar
Cutting	Hawes	Morrison

So Mr. KING's motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HALE, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 11452, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator from Oregon about the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4738) to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates was read twice by its title.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment to enable me to present a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 7726, the bill just received from the House of Representatives, being a bill to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, be ordered referred directly to the calendar without reference to the committee.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am speaking at the sufferance of the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has not the floor. Senators may not retain the floor while motions are entered and business is transacted. The Chair recognized the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Accepting the ruling of the Chair, I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator object if that order should be entered fixing a time definitely for limiting debate, or when we might vote definitely on the matter?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill has just come from the House, and no one before this hour could have known what the bill would contain. Several bills were pending in the House. Even the bill which passed was amended by that body within the last two hours, I will say. So no Member of this body, unless he has taken occasion to investigate since the bill was passed, knows what the bill contains. Therefore, it would be unfair at this time, I think, to consider fixing a time for the consideration of the bill. All I am asking is that the bill go on the calendar. There will be no chance for the Committee on Finance to give hearings on the bill at this late hour.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In just a moment. Replying more specifically to the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi, if the unanimous consent can be given to place the bill on the calendar, then it will be in order, I should say, at any time, to take it up and fix a time for consideration. At that time I shall be very glad to consent, as far as I am personally concerned, to any arrangement giving such time as may be necessary for the bill to be printed, and for Senators to read it.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see why the bill should go to the calendar. I will say to the Senator that it ought to go to the committee; and if it does go to the committee, I give notice now to all members of the committee to meet to-morrow morning at 9.30 or to meet this afternoon and report the bill out to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. If the bill is not to go to the calendar, and we can not take it up under an agreement to vote on it at a certain time, it seems to me it should go to the committee. But I do not see why the chairman of the committee should say we are going to report it out to-morrow. If it goes to the committee, it is going there for the consideration of the committee. I do not think there would be any desire upon the part of anybody to delay the matter, but after getting it back we could secure an agreement to limit debate on the bill and all amendments, and the consideration of the bill ought to be finished as soon as possible.

Mr. SMOOT. That can be arranged just as soon as the bill is reported to the Senate, and that is what I should ask for, if the Senator from Oklahoma did not ask for it. What I desire is a vote upon the bill, and I think every Senator desires the same thing; but I do not see any reason why this bill should take any course different from that taken by any other bill coming from the House, and especially as there is no inclination upon the part of any member of the committee to withhold immediate action upon it. Therefore I ask that it take its regular course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah to object to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request, that Senate bill 4412, to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national-banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, be restored to its place as the unfinished business, with the understanding, of course, that I shall have it temporarily laid aside for the consideration of any of the appropriation bills.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator whether he would include the relief bill, which is upon the calendar now, and consent to lay the unfinished business aside temporarily for the consideration of that measure?

Mr. GLASS. I think I would agree to that, it being an emergency bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I shall object to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GLASS. Then, if it is in order, I move to restore the bank bill to the status which it had before, when, while I was absent, it was displaced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Virginia that a motion is now pending to proceed to the consideration of H. R. 11452, and that the Senator's motion is not in order while the other motion is pending.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the Senator from Maine if he will withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator allow me to have my motion acted on? Then I will yield to him temporarily.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Maine whether it is his intention to proceed with the consideration of House bill 11452 to-day if it becomes the unfinished business?

Mr. HALE. No; I would like to have it taken up and made the unfinished business, and proceed with it the first thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. KING. While I have the floor——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. KING. The Senator yielded to me for a moment. It seems to me that the Senator from Virginia is entitled to have his request considered. The bill to which he has referred was displaced, I think, with many Senators here not understanding the parliamentary status of the bill, and it does seem to me he is entitled to have his motion to have it restored to its position considered by the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator from Maine that he would lose nothing by withholding his motion for a moment, because I have already stated that I shall ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for any appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That may only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GLASS. I shall always ask unanimous consent that that be done. It seems to me that in fairness this bill ought to be restored to its status on the calendar.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like very much to have the appropriation bill made the unfinished business, so that we can go ahead with it as soon as possible. I will yield to the Senator as soon as the Senate votes to take it up.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. I do not like the word "unfairness" used in this matter, because I do not think it applies. The bill referred to by the Senator from Virginia is a very involved bill. I think it has a lot of good in it. I am opposed to it on account of the branch-banking feature which it attempts to fasten on the country, and I think it would be impossible to pass it. Furthermore, I am told that more than a dozen amendments are to be proposed to it, and I doubt whether we have time to act on it.

If I were to make a request of the Senator from Virginia, I would make the request that he substitute his other bill for the one he has mentioned. He has another bill which came from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which provides for an expansion of the currency in a way that seems to be sound, which might ease up the whole banking situation, and which might help restore the price level. The bill to which the Senator is referring is a bill to restrict banks in their practice. I am not saying that critically. It is a bill to do away with the affiliates, which have proven an evil, and I would suggest that if that subject were separated it would meet with the approval of the Senate. But it is a bill to establish a new system of banking all over the United States, to do away with the dual system of banking, and to substitute a single system of banking, which I feel will be under too much central control.

On the question of fairness, I submit this, and I have never raised the question before. I was a member of the subcommittee which worked on the bill for nearly two years. The bill carried in it a provision that branch banking should be subject to the will of the States. State rights were preserved. Each State could determine the question for itself. Branch banking would not be in the law except as the States voted to establish a State branch-banking system. If I wanted to plead unfairness, I would plead this, that in my absence that feature was stricken out; and if the Senator from Virginia pleads unfairness, and he says he was home when his bill was displaced, I think one offsets the other, and therefore I suggest that he should not urge unfairness in order to have the bill taken up at this time.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into the merits of the bill. There was no unfairness in the committee, because the chairman of the committee, the Senator who has just spoken, had ample opportunity before the full committee to have his notions on branch banking restored to the bill.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; but it was taken up and discussed and decided in my absence.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator had full opportunity in the committee to have them restored before there was a report on the bill. But I do not intend to discuss those questions. The facts are simply these, that the banking bill was made the unfinished business. In my absence—and I am told unintentionally—its status was altered, and all I am seeking to do now is to restore that status of the bill in order that I may know whether I should longer waste my time fooling with a bill that is not to be considered. Therefore, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Maine, I will move to restore the bank bill to its status, with the distinct understanding that I shall ask to lay it aside whenever there is a desire to consider an appropriation bill, or the so-called Wagner labor relief bill, or the soldiers' bonus measure, of course.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I just want to make this suggestion, that the reason why I objected was the fact that I know perfectly well that if the bill which the Senator has in mind is brought up there will be long discussion of many features of the bill, especially the feature with reference to branch banking, which is opposed by a great many of us in the Northwest, which it would affect very seriously, and likewise a feature with reference to an appropriation out of the Treasury of $125,000,000. There are others in the Chamber who will bitterly oppose other features of the bill. It does seem to me that under those circumstances there is very little likelihood of the bill passing at this session of the Congress, and that it is more or less of a waste of time of the Senate to take it up and undertake to pass it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senate subscribes to the view of the Senator from Montana, I want to know it, so that I will not waste any more of my time. I have been devoting the last two years to this proposition. Incidentally, may I say to the Senator from the Northwest, the Northwest will be very much worse off without this bill than with it, and he will find that out, too, before next winter passes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. I do not want to go into that.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Northwest is worse off without it, I will say to the Senator from Virginia that the people of the Northwest, as distinguished from a few bankers out in the Northwest, are opposed to the bill and do not want it.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think the Senator knows that.

Mr. WHEELER. I think I do.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think so.

Mr. WHEELER. I think I am much more conversant with the Northwest and the people of the Northwest than is the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. That may be, but I do not think any Senator from the Northwest knows what the people want about this bill, because I do not think the people themselves know.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the Senator from Virginia knows what they want.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It does not seem to me to be a sound argument that we should not take up the bill simply because it is an important bill and will require discussion. There is no limit to this session except such limit as we may place upon it. I think the bill referred to by the Senator from Virginia ought to be disposed of, and I hope the other bill which the Senator has in charge will be brought forward also. It does not seem to me that because it is an important bill we should not undertake to dispose of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to give notice to members of the Finance Committee that the committee will meet at 9.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to say that I regard the bill commonly known as the Glass bill as a very important measure. I think it ought to be dealt with before we adjourn, no matter how long we may have to be here. At any rate, we ought to consider the bill. I think the country needs it. The whole financial and economic situation in this country requires that sort of legislation, and I hope the Senator will be able to get a vote on the bill before we adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That motion is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Considering the circumstances under which the Glass banking bill was displaced from a preferred status on the calendar, I believe that the Senate should restore it, and that the Senator from Maine ought to avail himself of the assurance given by the Senator from Virginia that he will ask, upon proper occasion, for the temporary laying aside of the banking bill to consider appropriation bills, the relief measure, and other emergency measures. It will, of course, be necessary to pass the naval appropriation bill. By reason of its nature it has a preferential right to consideration.

When the Glass bill was displaced it was not generally understood by the Senate that that end would result from the motion which actually displaced it, the author of the motion not having that purpose in mind. We necessarily agree upon a great many matters of procedure. Much time is saved by the processes of agreement. I commend the suggestion to the Senator from Maine, particularly in view of the fact that he has stated that he does not intend to proceed this afternoon with the consideration of the naval bill, and that therefore it will be necessary either to recess or to take up some other measure. I realize the pressure which the Senator from Maine feels is upon him to urge the immediate consideration of the appropriation bill, and there is no disposition here on the part of anyone to unduly defer action on that bill. It is my judgment that in all probability the business of the Senate will be speeded up if the Senator from Maine will see fit to comply with the request that has been made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when I made the motion to take up the naval appropriation bill I stated that I did not intend to proceed with it this afternoon. That statement was made because the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] told me that he had another matter that he wanted to take up which would not require very much time, and I told him I would withdraw temporarily in his favor.

I would like very much to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, but it seems to me that the request is not altogether a reasonable one. I made my motion in the regular order of procedure, as soon as the then unfinished business was gotten out of the way, and asked that my bill be taken up and become the unfinished business. Should I accede to the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and bring my bill before the Senate by temporarily laying aside his bill, one Senator could block that action, and I would then have to make a motion to set aside the bill of the Senator from Virginia, which I would not want to do. It seems to me that appropriation bills ought to have some right of way in the Senate; and therefore I must reluctantly insist upon my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. REED. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, so far as I know, I am in favor of both these bills. I may not fully understand the bill reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; but if I were opposed to his bill, I would grant him that measure of fair dealing to which I think he is entitled. Therefore I shall vote against taking up the naval appropriation bill now in order that the Senator from Virginia may have a chance to restore the status of his bill, especially when he has agreed to give way to appropriation bills, to the Wagner relief bill, and to the bonus bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I can not understand, since the bill in which the Senator from Virginia is interested was laid aside by necessary motion to take up an appropriation bill, why we should again give that bill a preferred status through which it holds the privilege of allowing no other legislation to be considered outside of appropriation bills. Why should the Senate be placed at the mercy of the banking bill and those who favor it? If at any time the Senate wants to take up the banking bill, its author can move to take it up. I do not see why appropriation bills and other important legislation should be placed at the mercy of the banking bill. There was no unfairness in the laying aside of that bill. It was done because of the situation which developed in connection with the appropriation bill and which may develop at any hour if we again place it in a similar status. For my part I shall vote to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I feel at this particular moment it would not be appropriate to reveal a situation which is being masked. There is a tendency on the part of Members of the Senate to hasten certain legislation, that it might be concluded and the Senate be relieved from its labors to enable certain of its Members, particularly of the Democratic side, to attend a convocation at Chicago that will go by the name of the Democratic National Convention. I am one of those who, as we gather from the public press, are to be among the victims of immolation destined to the altar and scheduled for the sacrifice at that variegated ceremony. I think it is fair to state, and ought to be stated without equivocation, and asserted to the public without any reservation, that as long as there remain bills that have to do with the public welfare, through which the great citizenship of the land is looking for relief, there should be no inclination disclosed on the part of this body of a willingness to desert those duties, to qualify or limit them merely for the privilege of attending an exhibition.

Speaking for myself I desire to say that there will be entertainment enough in the presentation of the panorama as now scheduled without calling for display of Senate celebrities. Sir, I feel that it is the duty of every Senator, and as I can not appraise the conduct of any other Senator other than by a parallel to myself, that we remain in session to the full extent made necessary by the call of every bill that is just now under the peculiar circumstances of our country made necessary to regain the confidence of the public, to restore national confidence, and to give wherever possible national relief to the present national disaster. I therefore suggest that it is our work now to proceed in whatever way every one of these measures of great importance shall command and for all time that shall give the freest consideration to the bill, the fullest deliberation to the purpose, and the calm and judicious vote as to its disposition. I urge that all theory of adjourning upon the mere purpose of attending a political convention of any political party be banished from the minds of patriotic Members of this body until these duties to the public that necessity demands have been performed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, no one could have the slightest doubt of the complete good faith of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] when he says that if he can get his banking bill made the unfinished business he will yield to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to take up the Navy appropriation bill. But think of the position in which that puts the Senator from Maine and the Navy appropriation bill. Any one Senator at any time, who is displeased with any action taken on the Navy appropriation bill, could rise in his place, demand the regular order, and "bang" would go the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Could he not move to take it up and would not the banking bill be displaced instantly?

Mr. REED. But would it? That is a question about which I am not so sure. For that reason I shall vote to take up the Navy appropriation bill, but I want it to be understood that the vote implies no dissent with the banking bill and no indisposition to consider it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, all I want is to have the Senate determine whether it is going to shelve the banking bill and assume responsibility for it. I do not want to bother with it any longer if that is the case.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has said about staying here until every important piece of legislation is passed. I am perfectly willing to stay here for the rest of the summer or until every piece of legislation is passed that ought to be passed. I think we ought to stay here until the relief bills are disposed of and until every other important piece of legislation is taken care of.

I am not at all in accord with the views of those who are anxious to get away from their legislative duties this week or next week and to kill important legislation. But I do not agree that we ought to place every piece of legislation that comes before the Senate at the mercy of the banking bill. We have passed two or three banking bills this session. We have just turned down the demands of agriculture in the Senate and sent the bill back to the committee.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, does the Senator think we can pass the banking bill through the Senate now?

Mr. WHEELER. We have not been able to pass anything but bills for the relief of the banks and the bankers.

Mr. NORBECK. That is the observation I was about to make.

Mr. WHEELER. When it comes to passing some legislation for the relief of the unemployed, it has been voted down. When we have come to pass some legislation in aid of the farmers, it has been voted down. We now have another bill which is for the relief of the bankers, and I, for one, am not willing to see it take precedence over every other piece of legislation. When appropriation bills or any other legislation come up in the regular order, they ought to be voted on, and then the banking bill ought to be voted on in its regular turn and in no other way.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). In view of my general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I refrain from voting.

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in respect to my general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] as on the previous roll call, and not knowing how he would vote if present, I refrain from voting.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. I find that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], with whom I am paired, would, if present, vote the same way that I desire to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Again announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] and my inability to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote, but if permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. As I am unable to make a transfer of that pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], which I transfer to the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and let my vote stand.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], and the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily out of the city.

I also wish to announce that the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. HULL] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] are absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Eslick.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 25, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to offer two amendments to the pending appropriation bill and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MCNARY. I desire the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to the agricultural appropriation bill.

The Chair laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate still in disagreement to the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 11, 1932.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 to the bill (H. R. 7912) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"AGRICULTURAL-CREDIT CORPORATIONS

"For carrying into effect the provisions of public resolution No. 11, entitled 'Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1932, $10,000,000 of the combined unexpended balances and repayments thereto of the appropriations contained in public resolution No. 114, approved January 15, 1931, and in the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932, approved February 14, 1931, to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 112, approved December 20, 1931, as amended (46 Stat. 1032, 1160, 1167), is hereby made immediately available as a revolving fund, as authorized by section 4 of said public resolution No. 11, of which fund not to exceed 2 per cent shall be available for the expenses of administration, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, purchase of law books and books of reference, and other necessary expenses: Provided, That the unobligated balances remaining in such appropriations (together with repayments credited thereto), not otherwise appropriated, shall be covered into the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year 1932 as 'Miscellaneous receipts.'"

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 29, 30, 53, 56, 61, 67, 68, 69, 77, and 82.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I propose the following motion, and will ask the clerk to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion offered by the Senator from Oregon will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I move that the Senate agree to the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 76; that it recede from its amendments Nos. 13, 16, 17, 21, 22, 29, 53, 61, 67, 68, and 69; that it further insist on its amendments Nos. 14, 15, 30, 56, and 82 (to correct totals); that it further insist upon its amendment No. 77, and ask a further conference with the House on said amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon to explain the effect of his motion. As he readily understands, it is impossible to follow the amendments by mere references to the numbers.

Mr. McNARY. The matter which was read by the clerk which is proposed to be inserted in lieu of the amendment adopted by the Senate relates to what is known as the George amendment, which was adopted in the Interior Department appropriation bill of last year and proposes to make available $10,000,000 for the purpose of the extension of rural credits throughout the country. The provision as read simply carries over for one year the amount of money that is unexpended and the amount that has been repaid and now forms a revolving fund. I think the Senator from Arkansas probably cooperated with the Senator from Georgia last year in the creation of this agricultural-credit institution, which is a temporary one. Now, in order to carry it on through this year, and to make funds available for the same specific purpose, namely, providing credit to farmers' organized credit associations, provision is made for the use of a revolving fund in this bill. In a word, that is what it means.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. There are a number of amendments in disagreement, as I understand?

Mr. McNARY. I will follow them up. The amendments from which the Senate recedes involve increases which the Senate put in the bill, such as the $10,000 item for carrying on the work as to diseases of animals, and various other items. The Senate committee recommended the increases, and that action was confirmed by the Senate. Now we have receded from them in order to curtail the amount of the appropriation. Five of the items are to correct clerical errors. There is only one vital amendment on which a further conference is asked. That is the grasshopper item, to which the House disagrees, and I am asking for a further conference, in the hope, while cutting down the amount of the appropriation, we may meet a very trying situation by a further conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to know whether there is any way by which this entire bill can be reopened? It passed the Senate at a time before we undertook our economy program, before the 10 per cent reduction was applied to other bills, and, in my judgment, there is more room for saving in this appropriation bill than in any measure which has been before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the Chair, the conference report must either be accepted or rejected in its entirety.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no way, then, as I understand the Chair, by which the bill may be reopened. Suppose the conference report is turned down and rejected, then, can the bill be reopened?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only in so far as the conference report relates to items which have not been agreed to. The Senator from Alabama may not be aware of the fact that a previous conference, representing a partial agreement, has been presented and adopted. Therefore, in so far as those items are concerned, that portion of the bill is beyond the further control of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I had hoped that there might be some parliamentary way by which we could again consider the items of this bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me advise the Senator from Alabama that the agricultural appropriation bill has been cut a larger percentage than has any of the other supply bills; as compared with the appropriations for the present year the cut has been 34 per cent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Even assuming that to be true, Mr. President, I went over the items in this bill when it was passed; and, while it has been a long while ago, I think there is ample room for cutting 10 or 15 or 20 per cent more from this bill if those who are really interested in the subject of the reduction of the cost of government will make the effort. I should like to have an opportunity to bring about such a result.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to the agricultural appropriation bill having passed before the Senate started out on its economy plan by reducing appropriation bills 10 per cent. We have already gone back on that plan, I will say to the Senator, because we refused to apply it in the case of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was not done with my consent.

Mr. NORRIS. Nor with mine, either.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, while we are on the subject of agriculture, I should like to make inquiry of the chairman of the appropriate committee as to what has been done with the bill which passed the Senate prescribing an interpretation of the farm-loan provision in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act?

It passed the Senate, as the Senator knows. That is in no wise involved in this matter, I judge.

Mr. McNARY. Probably I misunderstood the Senator's question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am speaking of the bill that was passed by the Senate about 10 days ago, prescribing, in a way, an interpretation of the farm-loan provision that was placed in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that bill did not come before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and I am advised that it is still in conference.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to say, referring to that particular measure, that the Secretary of Agriculture and his assistants have administered that particular provision of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act in such a way as to preclude as far as possible the people of my State from enjoying the benefits under it which Congress contemplated.

In the first instance, they made such restrictions upon loans that those engaged in truck farming could scarcely obtain an amount sufficient to carry on their operations. After that action had been taken, the appropriations having been made, an appeal was made by myself and many farmers in my State that they make available the necessary loan blanks in Florida, so that the people in that State could obtain the loans while they were planting their spring crops.

The Agriculture Department, acting under the direction, doubtless, of the Secretary, delayed for three or four weeks sending the loan blanks into my State and giving the citizens of that State an opportunity to apply for loans, when, if they know anything, they should have known that they should have used all possible haste in providing those facilities to the farmers of Florida.

When, by that manipulation, they had deprived the people of the State largely of obtaining loans at the time they were planting their spring crops, the next movement was that in their regulations they restricted the applications to April 30, and they placed blanks in the State only three or four weeks before April 30. They were four weeks later than they should have been in getting the blanks into Florida. They ruled that they would not make loans on applications after April 30, and that those who had applied for loans on farm crops, even where they would be harvested by December 31, would not be granted loans, because they had to file the applications before April 30; and more recently they have held that no loans would be made for any crop that would not be harvested during the year. On the other hand, my people and I feel that the law contemplated that they should be allowed to obtain these loans for crops of this year, even though they should not be harvested until next season.

The Senate passed a bill expressing that that was the will of Congress and the purpose of Congress in the enactment of it; and that is the measure in particular to which I made reference. I hope it will be hastened in the other branch of Congress, or, if it is in conference, by the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints the following conferees on the part of the Senate: The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

THE FURLOUGH PLAN

Mr. KING. Mr. President, now that we are considering reports of conferees, I desire to make an inquiry of my colleague the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], in view of the statement I saw in the paper yesterday that the conferees had agreed to throw out the provision first accepted by the Senate and to adopt the furlough plan. I saw that the Senator from Utah stated that that had been done, and I saw a contradiction of it by some of the conferees. Of course, I have no right to inquire as to whether an agreement has been reached; but, if the Senator from New Mexico cares to do so, I should be very glad to have him state whether that statement attributed to the senior Senator from Utah is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the junior Senator from Utah, I take this occasion to say that the conferees on the so-called economy bill have not reached an agreement respecting the furlough plan or the pay-cut plan. That matter is in disagreement, and the conferees are still considering it. No agreement, tentative or otherwise, has been reached on it. The divergence of opinion is sharp.

I can not say to the Senator anything respecting the statement attributed to his colleague. All that I am in position to say is that the conferees have not reached any agreement, tentative or otherwise, respecting the furlough plan or the pay-cut plan. The matter is still in dispute, and is under consideration by the conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say that there was apparently a misunderstanding about the furlough plan being agreed to by the conferees, as published in the paper. I will say to the Senator that it has not been agreed to yet, and we worked on it nearly all day.

I simply wanted to make that statement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very glad that my colleague makes that statement, because I hope the result will be quite different from that which would appear to be the result if the statement attributed to my colleague were accurate, which, as he now states, is wholly inaccurate.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 640, Senate Resolution 174, the resolution to investigate campaign expenditures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 174) for an investigation of campaign expenditures of presidential and senatorial candidates in 1932.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think at a prior session we agreed to the amendments.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment recommended by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was agreed to. That Senator is not in the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe he spoke to me about it; and I thank the Chair. I had entirely forgotten that. Does the Senator from Indiana have any objection to that reconsideration?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be reconsidered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, what is the amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment is to strike out $50,000 and insert $25,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware objects.

Mr. NORRIS. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I suppose we shall have to wait until the Senator from West Virginia is here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be returned to the calendar.

ARTICLE BY JONATHAN BOURNE, JR., ON INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM (S. DOC. NO. 109)

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an article by Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., formerly United States Senator from Oregon, and ask that it be printed as a public document. It is on the subject of independent bimetallism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting a nomination in the Consular Service, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND FRANCE ON DOUBLE TAXATION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider Executive K (72d Cong., 1st sess.), a convention between the United States of America and France on the subject of double taxation, signed at Paris, on April 27, 1932, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States of America:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, I transmit herewith a convention between the United States of America and France on the subject of double taxation, signed at Paris, on April 27, 1932.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the explanatory statement regarding the convention contained in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 3, 1932.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States of America and France to regulate certain questions relative to double taxation, signed at Paris, on April 27, 1932.

In explanation of this convention, the following statement is made:

The general purpose of this convention is to eliminate some of the most troublesome tax problems confronting American interests doing business in France. Under the existing French tax laws some American business concerns operating in France through French subsidiary corporations have been subjected to the so-called double-dividend tax. That is, in addition to the various French taxes imposed upon the income and dividends of the French subsidiary, an additional tax is asserted against the American parent corporations based upon the dividends which they declared, on the theory that a portion of the earnings and profits out of which such dividends were paid were derived from French sources. Under this convention France gives up its right to collect this tax upon compliance by American subsidiary concerns in France with certain procedural conditions.

Also under existing French law an American business concern doing business in France through an unincorporated branch is in addition to many other taxes subjected to a tax based upon a portion of the dividends which it declares. A method is provided in this convention by which this dividend tax may be eliminated if a corresponding tax is paid upon three-fourths of the profits derived in France by the unincorporated branch.

The two foregoing problems are the most important ones covered by the convention.

In addition, the convention provides for the reciprocal exemption of salaries of Government officials, war pensions, annuities, and royalties.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 2, 1932.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic, being desirous of regulating certain questions relative to double taxation, have decided to conclude a Convention on that subject, and for that purpose they have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

Mr. Walter E. Edge, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to France.

The President of the French Republic,

M. André Tardieu, Member of the House of Representatives, President of the Council of Ministers, Minister for Foreign Affairs, Officer of the Legion of Honour, who, having communicated to one another their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1

Enterprises of one of the contracting States are not subject to taxation by the other contracting State in respect of their industrial and commercial profits except in respect of such profits allocable to their permanent establishments in the latter State.

No account shall be taken, in determining the tax in one of the contracting States, of the purchase of merchandise effected therein by an enterprise of the other State for the purpose of supplying establishments maintained by such enterprise in the latter State.

ARTICLE 2

American enterprises having permanent establishments in France are required to submit to the French fiscal administration the same declarations and the same justifications, with respect to such establishments, as French enterprises.

The French fiscal administration has the right, within the provisions of its national legislation and subject to the measures of appeal provided in such legislation, to make such corrections in the declaration of profits realized in France as may be necessary to show the exact amount of such profits.

The same principle applies mutatis mutandis to French enterprises having permanent establishments in the United States.

ARTICLE 3

Income which an enterprise of one of the contracting States derives from the operation of aircraft registered in such State and engaged in transportation between the two States is taxable only in the former State.

ARTICLE 4

When an American enterprise, by reason of its participation in the management or capital of a French enterprise, makes or imposes on the latter, in their commercial or financial relations, conditions different from those which would be made with a third enterprise, any profits which should normally have appeared in the balance sheet of the French enterprise, but which have been, in this manner, diverted to the American enterprise, are, subject to the measures of appeal applicable in the case of the tax on industrial and commercial profits, incorporated in the taxable profits of the French enterprise.

The same principle applies mutatis mutandis, in the event that profits are diverted from an American enterprise to a French enterprise.

ARTICLE 5

American corporations which maintain in France permanent establishments may, in derogation of Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, elect to pay the tax on income from securities on three-fourths of the profits actually derived from such establishments, the industrial and commercial profits being determined in accordance with article 1.

An American corporation which wishes to place itself under the régime of the preceding paragraph must make a declaration to that effect at the Bureau of Registration within six months after the date upon which this Agreement becomes effective or within six months after the creation of its establishment in France. The election made for one establishment applies to all the establishments of such corporation. Any such election is irrevocable.

An American corporation shall not be subject to the obligations prescribed by Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, by reason of any participation in the management or in the capital of, or any other relations with, a French corporation, if such American corporation and French corporation conform to the requirements of the present article. In such case, the tax on income from securities continues to be levied, in conformity with French legislation, on the dividends, interest, and all other products distributed by the French enterprise; but it is moreover exigible, if the occasion arises, and subject to the measures of appeal applicable in the case of the tax on income from securities, on the profits which the American corporation derives from the French corporation under the conditions prescribed in Article IV.

An American corporation which wishes to place itself under the régime of the preceding paragraph must make a declaration to that effect at the Bureau of Registration jointly with the interested French corporation, within six months after the date upon which this Agreement becomes effective or within six months after the acquisition of the participation or the commencement of the relations of a nature to entail the application of Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872. Any such election is irrevocable.

American corporations which have not made the declaration and which are subjected to the provisions of Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, shall enjoy the benefits of Articles 27, 28 and 29 of the French law of July 31, 1920, and Article 25 of the French law of March 19, 1928, under the same conditions as French corporations.

ARTICLE 7

Compensation paid by one of the contracting States to its citizens for labor or personal services performed in the other State is exempt from tax in the latter State.

ARTICLE 8

War pensions paid by one of the contracting States to persons residing in the territory of the other State are exempt from tax in the latter State.

ARTICLE 9

The following classes of income paid in one of the contracting States to a corporation of the other State, or to a citizen of the latter State residing there, are exempt from tax in the former State.

(a) amounts paid as consideration for the right to use patents, secret processes and formulas, trade marks and other analogous rights;

(b) income received as copyright royalties;

(c) private pensions and life annuities.

ARTICLE 10

This Agreement shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification exchanged at Paris as soon as possible.

The Agreement shall become effective on the first day of January following the exchange of ratifications and shall remain effective for a period of five years, and thereafter until twelve months from the date on which either Contracting Party gives notice of its termination.

American corporations which prior to May 1, 1930, have not had their liability to tax under Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, finally determined, and which make the declaration prescribed in Article VI of the present convention, shall not be subject to the application of Article 3 of the Decree of December 6, 1872, for any years preceding the coming into force of the Agreement.

In witness whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles, both in the English and French languages, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Paris, on the 27th of April, 1932.

[SEAL] WALTER E. EDGE.

[SEAL] ANDRE TARDIEU.

PROTOCOL

At the moment of signing the Convention on Double Taxation between the United States of America and the Republic of France, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have agreed, as follows:

(1) The taxes referred to in this Agreement are:

(a) for the United States:

the Federal income tax—but it is understood that Article 1 does not exempt from tax (1) compensation for labor or personal services performed in the United States; (2) income derived from real property located in the United States, or from any interest in such property, including rentals and royalties therefrom, and gains from the sale or the disposition thereof; (3) dividends; (4) interest.

(b) For France:

in articles I, II, III and IV, the tax on industrial and commercial profits (impôt sur les bénéfices industriels et commerciaux);

in articles III, V and VI, the tax on income from securities (impôt sur les revenus des valeurs mobiliéres); in articles VII, VIII and IX, the tax on wages and salaries, pensions and life annuities (impôt sur les traitements et salaires, pensions et rentes viagères), and other schedular taxes (impôts cédulaires) appropriate to the type of income specified in said articles;

(2) The provisions of this Agreement shall not be construed to effect in any manner any exemption, deduction, credit or other allowance accorded by the laws of one of the contracting States in the determination of the tax imposed by such State.

(3) As used in this Agreement:

(a) The term "permanent establishment" includes branches, mines and oil wells, factories, workshops, warehouses, offices, agencies, and other fixed places of business, but does not include a subsidiary corporation.

When an enterprise of one of the States carries on business in the other State through an agent established there who is authorised to contract for its account, it is considered as having a permanent establishment in the latter State.

But the fact that an enterprise of one of the contracting States has business dealings in the other State through a bona fide commission agent or broker shall not be held to mean that such enterprise has a permanent establishment in the latter State.

(b) The term "enterprise" includes every form of undertaking whether carried on by an individual, partnership (société en nom collectif), corporation (société anonyme), or any other entity.

(c) The term "enterprise of one of the contracting States" means, as the case may be "American enterprise" or "French enterprise."

(d) The term "American enterprise" means an enterprise carried on in the United States by a citizen of the United States or by an American corporation or other entity; the term "American corporation or other entity" means a partnership, corporation, or other entity created or organized in the United States or under the law of the United States or of any State or Territory of the United States.

(e) The term "French enterprise" is defined in the same manner, mutatis mutandis, as the term "American enterprise."

(f) The American corporations mentioned in Articles V and VI are those which, owing to their form of organization, are subject to Article 3 of the decree of December 6, 1872. The present Agreement does not modify the régime of "abonnement" for securities.

(g) The term "United States," when used in a geographical sense, includes only the States and the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

(h) The term "France," when used in a geographical sense, indicates the country of France, exclusive of Algeria and the Colonies.

Done in duplicate at Paris, the 27th of April, 1932.

WALTER E. EDGE.
ANDRE TARDIEU.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is in some respects a rather technical treaty. It is a treaty designed to obviate certain forms of taxation which are imposed by the Government of France upon citizens of the United States doing business in France. It is not necessary to go into the form of taxes from which they are seeking relief.

The treaty accomplishes what was desired in regard to giving relief to the citizens of the United States doing business in France; and the only question in which the committee was particularly interested was whether, by reason of securing that relief the Government of the United States lost anything in the way of revenue.

I will read some statements from the hearing on the treaty:

The CHAIRMAN. You have succeeded in relieving these private parties of this onerous tax?
Mr. ALVORD. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. And it is your belief that the Government loses nothing and may gain considerable?
Mr. ALVORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, who is it that is testifying?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Alvord.

Mr. COUZENS. Who is he?

Mr. BORAH. He is a representative of the Treasury Department and the State Department who negotiated the treaty. [Reading:]

Mr. BALLANTINE. Yes, sir; that is our belief.
The CHAIRMAN. If that is the judgment of the experts I know of no way to add to it.

Then on page 10 Mr. Ballantine testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The prime object of the treaty is to relieve these companies or private interests from these burdensome taxes.
Mr. BALLANTINE. That is the prime effect, Senator.
The CHAIRMAN. How much, if anything, in the way of taxes does the Government lose.
Mr. BALLANTINE. It is our belief, Senator, that the net effect of this would be a gain in taxes, but, unfortunately, I am not in possession of the detailed classification of income which would be affected so as to make a demonstration of that mathematically.
We believe that French citizens are deriving from corporations vast income from patents or royalties which they have licensed American concerns to use.

Then, after Mr. Ballantine's statement, we called Mr. Alvord, one of the experts of the Treasury Department, also representing the State Department, who negotiated the treaty; and he testified, as I have already read, that in his opinion the Government would not lose but would gain by the transaction.

That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the treaty will be reported to the Senate.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive K, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a convention with France on the subject of double taxation, signed at Paris on April 27, 1932.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question? Will this treaty have any effect on the rights of those who use patent privileges? Will it increase the cost?

Mr. BORAH. It is not supposed to have any effect upon that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] More than two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the treaty is ratified.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is necessarily detained from the Senate this afternoon, I understand on his way to the funeral of the deceased Representative. I understand he has been very much opposed to this nomination, and he asked me some time ago to request that it go over if it came up during his absence.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, would it be possible to fix a time when the Senate might consider this nomination? It has been on the Calendar for some little time.

Mr. WHEELER. I can not very well do that, for the simple reason that I am making this suggestion at the request of the Senator from Tennessee. I understand he will be back in a day or so; and I assume that when he comes back, the matter can be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of B. B. Montgomery to be United States marshal, northern district of Mississippi.

Mr. MCNARY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Edgar Bernard Brossard to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I request that the nomination go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Colorado if we can not agree on a date for a vote on this nomination? The term of Mr. Brossard will expire to-morrow.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is my intention, I will say to the Senator from Utah, to discuss the nomination, and I am advised by the able and efficient Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that there will be several executive sessions of the Senate before we adjourn finally, in one of which such discussion may be had. I hope to proceed at the next executive session of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have a unanimous-consent agreement that at the next executive session the nomination of Mr. E. B. Brossard will be taken up and disposed of before adjournment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, while I desire to accommodate the Senator from Utah, and shall endeavor to do so, conditions permitting, it is necessary for me to object.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I give notice now that at the next executive session I shall move to proceed to the consideration of Mr. Brossard's nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the nomination will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Frank C. Patton to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of David D. Ashworth to be United States attorney, southern district of West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Harry A. Weiss to be United States marshal, northern district of West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ernest A. Burguieres to be commissioner of immigration, port of New Orleans, La.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this nomination was referred to the Committee on Immigration. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] appeared before the committee and objected to the confirmation of the nominee. The national committeeman of the Republican Party of that State, who is also Assistant Secretary of the Navy, appeared and earnestly urged confirmation. I understood the committee at that time either to reject the nomination or to hold it in abeyance, and I am somewhat surprised to learn that it is upon the calendar. In the absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana, I shall object.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. This nominee is from my State, a man whom I have known all my life. I indorsed him before the committee when the nomination was sent to me.

I do not know that my colleague, who is now in Louisiana running the legislature, should be allowed to prevent the confirmation of a man at this session. Will not the Senator from Utah permit this matter to be taken up?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think it has been an unwritten rule—and if I am mistaken, I want to be corrected—that where a Senator states that a given nominee is personally obnoxious and objects to his confirmation, the Senate has hesitated to confirm. Though I am disposed, of course, because of my friendship and high regard for the senior Senator from Louisiana, to look with favor upon his position, nevertheless I would feel, in the absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana, in the light of the statement which he made before the committee, that it was my duty to ask that the matter go over.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly it does not seem to me that the Senate should wait for the junior Senator from Louisiana to return and look after business here.

Mr. KING. The only request that I make is that it go over for a day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was at the meeting of the Committee on Immigration at which this nomination was reported out. The chairman of the committee had a great pile of testimonials to the integrity and ability of this nominee. Against that stood only the objection of the Senator from Louisiana, without any reasons assigned except that the nomination was obnoxious to him.

Under our rather well-established rule, if this were an office to be exercised wholly within the State of Louisiana, that would be conclusive, at least upon a large number of us, but the jurisdiction of this appointee extends over many States. There is no reason why the objection of personal obnoxiousness should extend to such a nomination any more than to a nominee for the Supreme Court of the United States, and we have repeatedly decided that that is the way the rule is to be applied.

If Senator LONG were coming back here to attend to his duties in the Senate, of course we would say that out of our customary courtesy we should wait until he got back, but he has announced both publicly and privately that he has no intention of coming back during the present session, that he is going to the conventions in Chicago, and is not coming back to Washington and to the Senate. There is no reason why all business should be stagnated because some one Senator goes away and leaves his duties unattended to. Therefore, with all deference to the Senator from Utah, I would respectfully insist that we must act upon this nomination, as we have come to it on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania was not present at the first meeting of the Committee on Immigration after this nomination had been sent by the President to the Senate. Senator LONG appeared before the committee and stated that he had telegrams from labor organizations of his State protesting against the confirmation of the gentleman referred to, and he supplemented that statement by the further statement that the nomination was personally obnoxious to him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. Just as soon as I complete the sentence I shall be very happy to yield.

The Senator from Pennsylvania was not there, and the committee then, according to my recollection, decided either not to report the nomination, to reject it, or to hold it in abeyance, and my memory does not serve me at the moment as to which of those courses was pursued.

Senator LONG was advised of the fact that the matter had been disposed of by the committee. I think he approached me later, and I told him that the committee had either refused to confirm, or had held the matter up, and he was justified, I feel sure, in assuming that no disposition favorable to the nomination had been made or probably would be made. He had a right to rely upon that fact.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I ought to yield first to my friend the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will not object to my replying to what the Senator has just said.

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing to be displaced.

Mr. REED. I do not want the Senator to be displaced against his will.

The chairman of the Committee on Immigration stated at our meeting this week that he had agreed merely to hold the matter over for a time, and he expressed his own opinion to be that that time had elapsed, that the matter had been held up quite long enough, in fact, too long; that no new objections had come in against the nominee, and it was then voted unanimously by the members of the committee who were in attendance, the Senator from Utah not being there, that the nomination should be favorably reported.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was there during the greater part of the session, but was compelled to leave for another important committee meeting, and had no notice of the fact that this matter would be taken up. I will say very frankly that my inclination is to vote for the confirmation of this nominee, but I do feel that the situation is such that it would be rather unfair to Senator LONG to confirm this nominee at this time. I think the chairman of the committee should notify him, in view of all the facts which have come to my knowledge, that he will urge the nomination of this man at the next executive session of the Senate, giving Senator LONG an opportunity to be heard and to present his views.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator yields further to the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I can see the suggestion he is about to make, I want to ask the Chair whether this is the first executive session of the Senate since this nomination was reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the nomination was reported on June 13 and that there has not been an executive session since that time until to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it would go over upon objection under the rule, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would.

Mr. NORRIS. All the Senator from Utah would have to do would be to object.

Mr. KING. In view of all the facts, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will go over.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Utah agree that the matter may be brought up and disposed of at the next executive session? I will see to it that immediate notice is given Senator LONG by telegram.

Mr. KING. I do not want to make any agreement with regard to the matter. This is a very unpleasant task, I will say to the Senator, for me to assume, but I do feel that a Senator who is not here and who does not know that a matter is to be brought up, ought to be protected. After due time is afforded the Senator to appear, or to transmit his views to the Senate, I shall not object to the matter being taken up.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Utah is one of the most scrupulous in attendance to his duties here on the floor of the Senate, and I know that he agrees with me that it is indefensible for any one of us to go away in the absence of an emergency, and to remain away for weeks at a time, and expect the business of the Senate to stagnate in his absence.

Mr. KING. I do not want to be the judge of the conduct of anybody; we all have so many infirmities, but I think it might be a wise thing for the Senator to be here as much as possible, as others are.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. Reserving the right to object, I ask that Calendar No. 4793, the nomination of Charles J. Moos to be postmaster at St. Paul, Minn., may go over.

Mr. ODDIE. I agree that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar, with the exception of Calendar No. 4793, will be considered as having been confirmed en bloc.

THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. REED. I ask that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy and Marine Corps.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the nominations in the Navy and Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 16, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1932

The House was called to order at 11 o'clock a. m. by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art the sun of righteousness, the rainbow about the throne, and the bright and morning star, tarry with us a few moments. We mourn our loss. O bathe all sorrowing ones in the golden light of heavenly love and reconciliation. May we all exemplify the excellence of our most holy faith. Enrich our characters and make our afflictions a sacred ministry. Almighty God, overshadow this Congress with Thy unfailing goodness; remember our Speaker most graciously. Amid the strain of the days, the weariness of toil, the exactions of the public service, may our hearts and our hopes remain steadfast. Cleanse our hearts, for it is with the heart we find Thee in the darkness and feel the strengthening virtue of Thy unfolding presence. O sad hearts, it is evening; O curtained night, fade away. As we pause and pray, let the stars break through. Merciful Father, through tears and through loss, be our everlasting light until the day's pilgrimage shall be ended. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 236

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn until 10 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing resolutions the Presiding Officer had appointed Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. HULL, Mr. CAREY, Mr. KEYES, Mr. BLACK, Mr. BULOW, and Mr. GEORGE members of the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1153. An act to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia; and

S. 3911. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close Quintana Place, between Seventh Street and Seventh Place NW.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 10048. An act granting to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California certain public and reserved lands of the United States in the counties of Los Angeles, Riverside, and San Bernardino, in the State of California.

SOLDIER BONUS, PROHIBITION, AND OTHER SUBJECTS

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the soldiers' bonus and some other matters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, in supporting the payment of the bonus I do so after much consideration and knowing the condition of the thousands of veterans of my district as well as others of my citizens.

The fight for the payment of the bonus has been conducted on the floor of this House by as patriotic a set of men as ever served here, and also I grant to those that oppose the legislation the same right to their opinion as I have to mine. The interest shown by those in favor of meeting this emergency was never equal in the patriotic support to that of our late lamented colleague, Mr. Eslick, of Tennessee.

His interest was so intense in support of this legislation that he, no doubt, knowing he was not strong enough to undertake the participation in the defense, as he so valiently did on yesterday—he, in the midst of debate earnestly supporting the cause, as he did, succumbed in the midst of his argument and accepted the summons that will come to us all. Never a soldier on the battlefield gave his life for a cause in a more patriotic manner than did Mr. Eslick.

If it was not for the terrible depression, there would not be a demand for immediate payment of the bonus and there would not have been the necessity for all the propaganda in opposition created by Wall Street bankers. If the bankers had operated in the interest of the American people and had not speculated so disastrously, this situation would not exist and this pitiable crusade of thousands of veterans would not have been undertaken and their need would not have dictated the undergoing of present suffering and inconveniences that is so noticeable.

I am for the payment, first, because of the great distress amongst the veterans, and again because I believe a currency expansion necessary, and this bill will provide a means to that end. The bankers and speculators that are responsible for this condition are opposed to this. In the past six years always have I opposed the operations of these gentlemen and the corporations they control. They opposed the Muscle Shoals bill; I supported it because the farmers of this land and the consumers of electricity would benefit. They opposed the Goldsborough bill; I supported it because it would raise the price of cotton, tobacco, peanuts, and farm prices generally. They supported the moratorium; I opposed it because I saw in it the entering wedge of complete war-debt cancellation and because it served to protect Wall Street's foreign investments at the expense of the American taxpayer to the extent of more than $257,000,000 this past year, and if cancellation is permitted you will see how much our annual loss will be.

I am consistent in my opposition to measures backed by these gentlemen, and I have been consistent in my support of measures opposed by them. In six years I have yet to see a measure bearing the indorsement of these gentlemen, which at the same time offered any material benefits to the plain people of this Nation. If the people derived such benefits, it was an oversight on their part. They did not want the seed loans to go to the farmers, but I did help to see that the farmers did get some of these benefits.

All of these circumstances I submit, Mr. Speaker, prove my allegiance to the cause of the common people of my district and the Nation. In pursuing that consistent course, I measured my views on prohibition with the same yardstick.

The recent trend in the third Florida district and elsewhere in that State discloses widespread dissatisfaction with prohibition. The people want the opportunity to express their will, and they have a right to so express it. I propose to support my party in its probable demand for a popular referendum or resubmission.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that both parties will declare in favor of a referendum or a resubmission. I am a Democrat, and I conceive it to be my duty as such to carry out the wishes of my people. I am a loyal party man, and I expect the national convention, which is the supreme court of the Democratic Party, to declare in favor of a referendum or resubmission. I shall support that decision. When my party makes the decision, which it is conceded it will do, that decision will enable me to carry out the wishes of the party 12 months sooner than anyone else could, except the present Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I have frankly and honestly stated my convictions. I am willing to rise or fall, sink or swim, upon these convictions and my record. If the people of my district feel that I am right in what I have said and done, and that my seniority and the almost certainty of a Democratic victory will put me in a position to be of more service to my district than I have ever been able to be, I shall accept with profound gratitude the high trust which an intelligent and grateful constituency confers upon me.

But, whether elected or defeated, I shall always carry in my heart eternal gratitude and love for the people of my district who by their generosity and goodness made it possible for me to realize the fondest and greatest ambition of my life.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the address delivered by General Harbord on the occasion of the graduation exercises at the West Point Academy.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, General Harbord is not a Member of the House and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is not going to let the gentleman do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. On behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I object.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF HOWARD UNIVERSITY ON FRIDAY, JUNE 10, 2.30 P. M.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, June 10, the President of the United States participated in the commencement exercises of Howard University and made an address upon the occasion.

Howard University is the foremost institution contributing to the education and leadership of the Negro race.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks be extended by including the address of the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

It is an inspiration to come into this institution of higher education for the Negro race. Nothing that the Federal Government has done reflects more credit upon it for the meeting of an obligation than this institution to bring to a great segment of our population the means of overcoming a handicap for which they were not responsible and of leveling upward for them an equal opportunity to share in the full measure of citizenship with their brethren of other races.

It is vital in a democracy that the public opinion upon which it rests shall be an informed and educated opinion. The Negro race comprises 10 per cent of our population and unless this 10 per cent is developed proportionately with the rest of the population it can not pull its proper strength at the oars of our pressing problems of democracy. To provide this development requires trained leadership, and I concede that to be the function of Howard University.

You are providing here professional training in all fields to which the community naturally looks for leadership—religion, law, medicine, education, science, and art. You are providing this professional training to men and women of the colored race to your own best talent, your own leaders by natural endowment. Through the instruction which they receive here, your natural leaders become trained leaders, and this training is of the same kinds and of equal efficiency with that which is provided for the natural leaders of the white race. By this process the colored people are being integrated fully into the broad stream of the national life, sharing in the obligation and opportunity for political service, for economic advancement, for educational development of the individual, and for enjoyment of all the benefits of science and art and general culture, including skilled medical service, more beautiful home surroundings, and a share in the intellectual progress of mankind.

These things are the natural right of the citizens of a republic. The Federal Government has nobly acknowledged its duty to provide them here.

I congratulate the graduating class upon completing their studies with credit, and I congratulate the Negro race upon your efforts to prepare yourselves for leadership in their development. I wish you well in your careers upon which you now embark.

THE FURLOUGH PLAN AND THE RURAL CARRIERS

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point by including therein a brief statement concerning the furlough plan as applied to rural carriers and also to include a brief statement from the organization itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, with the exception of city districts proper, practically every Member of the House is directly interested in the application of the proposed furlough-plan salary reductions to rural letter carriers. Rural carriers through their organization have repeatedly expressed their willingness to accept reductions if such reductions were fairly comparable to those in similar salary brackets. Statements recently made as to the inequities of the five-eighths equipment allowance have been made by Representative COCHRAN and Senator BRATTON. In preparation for consideration of the conference report on this particular matter I again call the attention of the House to these statements found on page 12881 and 12909 of the RECORD and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a letter received this morning summarizing the position of the rural carriers.

NATIONAL RURAL LETTER CARRIERS ASSOCIATION,
NILES, MICH., June 15, 1932.

Hon. J. C. KETCHAM,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KETCHAM: Fearful there still may be some Member of Congress who does not fully appreciate the injustice of the Senate furlough plan as it applies to the 41,597 rural letter carriers of the country, I am availing myself of your considerate invitation to make a summation of the position of the National Rural Letter Carriers Association, together with an itemization of the communications I have directed on behalf of our membership of 39,556.

The National Rural Letter Carriers Association from the outset has firmly taken the position that any reduction in Government salaries would be a shortsighted policy, diminishing the purchasing power of the country on one hand and on the other causing governmental chieftains who take such scrupulous care of private contracts to virtually repudiate their much more solemn contracts with their own employees.

Nevertheless, our membership, composed as it is of a cross section of the most patriotic and conscientious Americans that can be found in the land, is keen enough to comprehend the problems facing our national legislators, and, regardless of our convictions, we have silently followed the perplexing and complex economy problems with which Congress has been wrestling.

But Congress purposes to prescribe one kind of medicine for the vast majority of Government employees and an entirely different and more biting variety for all rural letter carriers.

The Government worker with a $2,100 salary is being asked under the furlough plan to give up $175 in exchange for 30 days' vacation. The rural letter carrier with a 34-mile route, drawing a basic salary of $2,100, is being asked to sacrifice $247.35, or $72.35 more in exchange for but 15 days' vacation.

Our position on this proposed discrimination has been one of violent opposition ever since it was first forwarded to the House Economy Committee by the White House.

On April 14 we forwarded a letter to President Herbert Hoover in which we forcefully outlined how the furlough plan was unfair to the carrier body.

On April 15 we addressed a protest to every Member of Congress sharply contrasting the economy contribution proposed for all Government employees except rural carriers, citing figures to prove as high as 27.57 per cent of a rural carrier's income would be taken from him under the furlough plan.

On April 16 a statistical table showing in detail the discrimination of the furlough plan as it applies to rural carriers was printed in our official organ and sent to every Member of Congress.

On May 21 we addressed a lengthy brief to the Senate Economy Committee thoroughly covering the discouraging outlook for rural carriers if so drastic a deduction is made under the furlough plan.

On June 11, when we observed that the furlough plan evidently was being held in high esteem by some of the Senate and House conferees on the economy amendment, we hastened another general letter to all Members of Congress "protesting vigorously the discrimination of the furlough plan" and pleading that the three-eighths in the present amendment be changed to nine-sixteenths.

On June 12 we circulated a mimeographed table among Members of Congress, again showing in detail the discrimination of the furlough plan as it applies to rural carriers.

On June 13 Representative JOHN COCHRAN, of Missouri, who hasn't a single rural carrier in his district, was forcibly impressed by the gross injustice proposed to be inflicted on rural carriers under the furlough plan, and he had inserted in the RECORD a plea in our behalf, supported by a statistical table.

On June 14 Senator SAM G. BRATTON, of New Mexico, who steadfastly has stood for equitable salary reduction, had the same material inserted in the Senate record.

We now feel that Congress is completely informed of the unhappy situation of rural carriers under the furlough plan as it passed the Senate.

Furthermore, we are heartened to the extent that we are confident that Congress will not countenance this discrimination.

If Congress finally decides that the furlough plan is the most expeditious method of economizing on Government salaries, we merely implore that rural carriers be paid nine-sixteenths of their equipment allowance for the next fiscal year instead of three-eighths, as now provided.

Thanking you for this opportunity of restating our position and enumerating the actions taken on behalf of our membership, we are,

Sincerely yours,
THE NATIONAL RURAL LETTER CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
By W. G. ARMSTRONG, National President.

ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATE

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House, "lest we forget," what do the adjusted-compensation certificates represent? In the first instance, they represent a confession that the Government, as then administered, unjustly discriminated in favor of civilian employees at home and against the veterans in its military service. This discrimination was in the glaring inequality of compensation. The Government drafted the young men of our country, jammed them into military service, into crowded training camps, across submarine-infested seas, into training camps overseas, into trenches, into warfare indescribable.

The Government had the power likewise to draft its civilian population for service in the manufacture of munitions, construction of camps, of ships, and in fact in all the various lines essential to support its military objectives. And yet, with this power, the administration paid its civilian employees from $6 to $15 for eight hours per day and its soldiers in the military service but $1 per day at home and $1.10 per day overseas. With the power to regulate and prevent, it permitted civilian employees to exact exorbitant wages. It paid racketeers huge profits for supplies, munitions, and on Government contracts and penalized our boys in the military service of our country.

It took over the railroads during the war at a fixed rental price which produced one of the largest incomes the roads had ever made up to that time, and after the war was over, when the roads plead that their profits had been diminished by governmental operation, it paid them in readjustments of such claims sums aggregating about $2,000,000,000. Princely sums were also paid to contractors as readjustment on account of uncompleted contracts suddenly made unnecessary by the cessation of the war, and to its civilian employees. And these adjustments were all made in cash.

But what did it do with our boys to whom it intrusted the fate of the world? It took them over at $30 a month for home service and $33 for overseas service. It carried insurance on its ships, its munitions, its supplies—but none on the precious flesh and blood which we sent into foreign battlefields. No; it practically compelled them to take out their own insurance, which, with allotments from their pay for dependents at home, reduced the paltry monthly sum by about $20.

As this great, grievous wrong and discrimination gradually developed and dawned on the people, the demand for adjustment of such glaring discrimination became nation-wide and finally resulted in the proposal of adjustment legislation. Selfishness, greed, ingratitude immediately reared their ugly heads in vociferous protest. What class was it that utilized every possible means to defeat it? Was it the farmers, who profited less than anyone from the war, and whose contribution in foodstuffs for the Nation and its defenders was second in value only to that of the boys themselves? Was it labor, which always pays its part of the expenses of government? No. The vicious opposition came from the financial interests of the country. They resorted to misrepresentation and poisonous propaganda of every description. Nothing was too low and sordid and selfish for them to use to poison the clear streams of public opinion. They poisoned the wells of public opinion and finally wrested a compromise of the noble purposes of the people which resulted in the issuance of the adjusted-compensation certificates.

"Lest we forget," just what do they represent in the way of adjustment? Briefly, they represent the amount due the veteran for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, on a basis of $1 per day for home service and $1.25 a day for that overseas, plus 25 per cent on account of deferred payment and interest at 4 per cent from January 1, 1925, the total amount payable at death or on January 1, 1945. If the amount is not more than $50, then it is payable in cash and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no overseas service is limited to $500 and for the veteran who had some oversea service, to $625.

What do these figures show in the way of adjustment with the actual pay? The actual compensation while in the service plus the compensation provided by the certificate is $2 per day for home service and $2.35 for oversea service, plus 25 per cent of the adjusted-compensation credit and interest at 4 per cent as explained, as compared to the average wage of the civilian or the Government employee upon war contracts in the amounts of from $6 to $15 per day. And if they have held their certificates for two years, then they are now entitled to borrow up to 50 per cent of the face value, but they must pay interest on such loans in excess of the 4 per cent interest computed in the value of the certificates.

The Government settled with the railroads, with the war contractors, with its civilian employees—and settled with them in cash. Only with the veteran did it sidestep the issue and hedge it about with conditions. Only with this class did it acknowledge an obligation and postpone its payment for 20 years.

The railroads did not win the war; neither did the contractors, the war profiteers, nor the civilian employees. In their complacent security at home they contributed for exorbitant cash considerations. The main contributing cause winning the war was the service of the veterans. Let us not forget that. Why are they not entitled to the same consideration shown the civilian employees, the contractors, the war racketeers?

They are in need now as never before of a little ready cash to pay their debts, to bring a few additional comforts to a home, to tide them over in this emergency. Payment of the certificates now will provide relief for our veterans and their dependents, and indirectly, through increasing the money in circulation, for the farmers, the stockmen, the laborers, the producers generally and the banks located in the producing sections of the country as well. It will save millions in administrative expense.

We have extended aid to big business, to commerce. We have subscribed through legislation to a policy of assisting the banks in thawing out their frozen assets. Payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates will thaw out frozen assets in the amount of more than $2,000,000,000, will directly benefit approximately 3,512,896 ex-service men and will increase the actual cash in circulation to an amount almost double that in circulation to-day.

And it is money in actual circulation that this country must have to-day. There is no substitute. The reconstruction act authorizing loans to railroads and various financial agencies checked the closing of the banks and the roads from going into receiverships. It halted our descent into what might have been a complete collapse and ruinous panic, but it has not started restoration. The loans must be repaid. The liberalization of credit to be extended by the Federal reserve banks has not been utilized. The big financial institutions still hoard and refuse to lend.

The $125,000,000 additional capital to the Federal land banks has benefited but has not halted the relentless foreclosure of farm mortgages with the prices of farm products below the cost of production.

Farmers in every section are unable to pay their taxes, interest, and coming-due obligations. They are being dispossessed of their homes and their children deprived of their educational opportunities. Unless we restore the purchasing power of farm products to its normal economic level there can be no recovery from this depression. Agriculture is the basic industry. Our efforts should be centered upon its rehabilitation.

The dollar has become too dear. It takes 3 bushels of wheat to buy a dollar to-day where formerly it took but 1, with cotton and other farm products in like proportion and the farmer must have the dollar with which to pay his interest and taxes. Increase the dollars in circulation and you increase the price of farm products. The remedy for restoration therefore lies in the increase of dollars in circulation.

Even the Washington Post, representing the conservative financial interests of the country, in its issue of April 11, finally concedes that all chance of recovery hinges upon a turn in commodity prices, that so long as existing prices prevail, business will continue to be paralyzed. Heroic emergency measures that will arrest the fall of prices seem to be in order. "Some powerful agency must be thrown into the breach to restore the value of goods and services against the exaggerated value of money." We incorporate the editorial in full as a graphic description of existing conditions and suggestive of emergency measures to restore the purchasing power of goods and services.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE UNDERLYING PROBLEM

A fresh wave of deflation swept over the country last week, leaving the people in a confused and uneasy state of mind. For a time the forces of depression were checked by the new blood poured into the veins of commerce by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other constructive measures. But these factors were not sufficient to turn the forces of deflation into a positive movement toward recovery. It is well for the public to face the fact that heroic measures are necessary to turn the tide of depression.

A few weeks ago attention was concentrated on the extension of credit. The banks were the center of the crisis. Banks were failing at a rate of about 400 per month. Emergency measures initiated at the White House mobilized the resources of the Nation behind bank credit. The epidemic of failures was quickly cured, and the banks are in a much stronger position than before. Now they have ample money and credit reserve, but the benefits of that improved position are not flowing out to the people.

There are two chief reasons for this condition. First, the banks are reluctant to lend money because of fear that their own safety may be jeopardized. Second, even if the people can borrow, they hesitate to do so because of the uncertainty of business and because falling prices and security values make the repayment of loans an extreme hardship.

The banks are not taking full advantage of the liberal credit allowances given them in the Glass-Steagall Act. Additional credit can be used only when other resources have been exhausted, and no bank wishes to admit that it is forced to resort to extraordinary measures. To this extent the working of the new regulations, which were expected to be a potent force in the restoration of normal conditions, are a disappointment. Congress did not reckon with the selfishness of some bankers who are concerned only with stabilizing their own establishments.

No elasticity of credit, however, could overcome the tendency of business to lie dormant while there is no hope of operation without fresh losses. All chance of recovery seems to hinge upon a turn in commodity prices. On April 1 a group of 110 representative commodities were selling for 17½ per cent less than they brought a year ago. This is superimposed upon a decline of 20 per cent in the previous year. So long as this condition remains unchanged business will be paralyzed. All the credit in the world can not induce business to go deeper into the red.

Value in the United States is being slowly concentrated into money. The dollar increases in value every day, while everything else loses some of its relative worth. In spite of the antihoarding campaign and the liberalizing of credit, this situation encourages the liquidation of all other forms of wealth. The value of the dollar has reached such a high point that the people are tempted to convert all their holdings into dollars to avert further shrinkage.

Unless this vicious movement is checked, it will result in panic. The extension of credit will not be sufficient. Heroic emergency measures that will arrest the fall of prices seem to be in order. How that can be done without unwarranted inflation of the currency is not clear, but every fresh wave of deflation makes more urgent the necessity of restoring some measure of balance between money and commodity prices.

The best brains of the country ought to be concentrated on this problem. This economic malady has reached a point where it can not be expected to cure itself without leaving horrible scars. Palliatives will not yield the desired effect. Business can not turn toward stability unless the whole tendency toward lower price levels is reversed. Some powerful agency must be thrown into the breach to restore the value of goods and services against the exaggerated value of money.

The people would not countenance the manufacture of fiat money to make prices rise. But some method of currency expansion on a sound gold basis might be necessary. Emergencies of this kind call for drastic action which goes to the heart of the problem. All the benefits which have accrued through bank stabilization will be lost unless the forces of deflation are arrested. It is time for the leaders in Government and financial circles to focus their minds upon a realignment of values.

"Currency expansion on a sound gold basis," which the Post says is essential to recovery, will be effected by the payment of the compensation certificates. The cancellation of the indebtedness will afford an adequate consideration and the veterans an agency through which the currency can be expanded more than $2,000,000,000 directly into the channels of trade, reaching every section of the country. The money thus paid will not only cancel a just obligation but will be put in immediate circulation. It will not be hoarded but expended for the family necessaries of life, benefiting all classes in every community.

The following table shows the distribution in each State:

Column 1. Residence by States of all veterans holding adjusted-service certificates.
Column 2. Number of veterans in each State holding certificates.
Column 3. After deducting all prior loans, the amount remaining due veterans of each State if full-payment bill is passed by Congress.
Column 4. Full payment will average per person, or for every man, woman, and child, in the State according to the 1930 census. The approximate amount of money that will be put into circulation in any city, county, or locality may be arrived at by multiplying the population by the per capita payment for that State.
The information for columns 1, 2, and 3 of this table was compiled from information furnished by the Veterans' Administration. The other information was obtained from the statistical division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and other governmental sources.

The objections against the payment proposed are first, that it would inflate the currency, and second, unbalance the Budget—neither one of which is a valid objection against the bill with the Owen amendment now incorporated in its provisions. The proposal is to place in the hands of the reserve banks a sufficient amount of United States bonds at 3½ per cent, subject to sale by order of the Federal Reserve Board in the event such would become necessary to control and stabilize the dollar. The sale of the bonds would permit the retirement of redundant currency, which I do not believe would ever become necessary, and if the bonds were not sold, the rate of interest would not run.

The distribution of $2,400,000,000 directly in the payment of a valid and subsisting obligation of the Government would supply the much needed and necessary money in actual circulation to relieve us from this depression. The veterans and their families will never be in greater need of such assistance than now; neither will the local trade activities, now dormant. The money will be expended for labor, for merchandise, for professional services. It will increase consumption and furnish employment and a market for farm products. It will initiate the resumption of business, which will finally develop into a restoration of confidence and lure the hidden and hoarded money gradually into investments, gathering within its current accretions in increasing amounts essential to a restoration of normal business conditions. It will not inflate the currency! It will not unbalance the Budget! It will not increase the cost of government, but will discharge an acknowledged obligation and stimulate business, resulting in increased revenues to the Public Treasury!

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES AND ECONOMY

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the economy program of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have made the study of taxation, revenue, and public expenditures something of a hobby. As the years have gone by, I have viewed with increasing concern the mounting cost of government. This has reached a point in many parts of the country which has necessitated the levying of confiscatory taxes. As a result, hundreds of thousands of acres of farm land have passed into public ownership. Unless the trend ceases, the theories so stoutly maintained by Henry George will soon become a reality. There are only three ways by which this trend can be stopped, and that is by: First, a drastic reduction of public expenditures; second, a radical change in the system of taxation, so as to relieve lands of a large part of their present burden; and, third, a greatly increased income from farm lands. Manifestly a combination of the three remedies is the most desirable way out.

I am not unmindful of the fact that, on the whole, the Federal Government has set a good example. Between 1921 and 1929 it not only reduced taxes but reduced the national debt by nearly a billion dollars a year, but it must not be forgotten that this was a period of great national prosperity, except in the agricultural industry, and that the constantly decreasing tax rates were reflected by increasing returns to the National Treasury. National expenditures were also held down to a commendable degree, but were not reduced sufficiently to stand the shock of adverse conditions when they came. With the deflation of 1929 came the crashing of incomes and the destruction of fortunes. The fiscal year 1932 has witnessed a stagnation in business that has depleted our revenues to a point where they represent something less than one-half of our total expenditures. These expenditures have been greatly increased due to a considerable number of relief measures that have required large sums. In an effort to balance the Budget for 1933 huge additional levies were resorted to in the recent tax bill; but if such balancing of the Budget is to become a reality, there must be a drastic reduction in expenditures. It is our duty to see to it that this becomes an accomplished fact. If some of the wild schemes now proposed should go through, the Treasury would be hopelessly swamped, indebtedness would increase, and taxation would become a serious bar to business recovery. We can not squander ourselves into prosperity.

In late February the House organized the Select Economy Committee. On April 28 we brought in a bill designed to save from $200,000,000 to $225,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933. A House composed of Members who personally stood pledged to economy struck down title after title until only some $42,000,000 in saving were left. To my mind, this action was one of inexcusable folly. That bill was the result of eight weeks of the hardest kind of work on the part of seven Members of this House and represented the tacit instructions of this body and the recommendations of the President. It is true that the President did not approve of the method pursued in dealing with the reduction in the Federal pay roll, but the plan suggested by him, while not affecting the basic pay, would have dispensed with the annual leave with pay which, if adopted, would have saved some $5,000,000 more than the committee pay-cut plan. The Senate has restored most of the deleted House provisions and inserted the President's furlough plan, which will save $85,000,000 next year if retained.

Members who have not kept in close touch with public sentiment in their home districts have little conception of the feeling that prevails throughout the country. The taxpayers are in no mood to continue the present scale of expenditures and are going to demand an accounting of their representatives here. Unless this Congress redeems itself on the economy bill, there are going to be a lot of new faces in the Seventy-third Congress.

In a notable article published in the Saturday Evening Post of March 26, 1932, Calvin Coolidge called attention to the fact that taxes—local, State, and National- -had climbed from 6.4 per cent of our national income in 1913 to 14.4 per cent of our national income in 1930. Since then our national income has greatly fallen, with no corresponding reduction in our tax load. It is highly probable that for the year 1932 the total tax burden will run very close to 20 per cent of our national income. Manifestly such a load is beyond endurance.

Most of the communications received at my office in which a demand is made for tax reduction overlook the exceedingly important fact that taxes for the most part are local and that the loss of property for taxes is almost exclusively due to these levies. This fact, however, does not relieve us one whit here. It is up to us to cut out every Federal activity that is not essential and to reduce the national-tax load to the absolute minimum, but it is even more essential that we do not overlook the things that are right at our doors.

Because this is so I want to devote some time to the tremendous increase of expenditures by States and lesser subdivisions. It has proved impossible to get segregated data for the smaller units, such as townships and school districts, but as these are included under the general term "local" taxes, we can get a general picture of the whole.

I have before me a table prepared at my request by the Bureau of the Census in the Department of Commerce. An examination of the figures discloses that State revenues increased from $458,232,597 in 1915 to $2,243,110,687 for 1930, while expenditures for the period increased from $494,907,084 to $2,290,270,069. State expenditures continued to mount higher and higher with every passing year and to outrun revenues so that the net result was to increase the gross debt of the States for the time discussed from $580,408,081 to the stupendous sum of $2,444,122,201. In other words, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in taxes, expenditures exceeded income by $1,290,270,059.

Turning now to cities having a population of 30,000 and over, we find an even worse situation. In 1913 these cities had an income of $866,277,110, with total expenditures aggregating $984,141,689. By 1930 income had increased to $3,418,502,995 for the year, but expenditures had climbed to $3,810,681,763. With two exceptions the annual expenditures for the period had exceeded income with an everincreasing volume of indebtedness which had reached a staggering total of $10,018,416,034 for 1930. This indebtedness has been greatly augmented during the last two years but the figures are not available.

The counties have followed the same course. Their revenues for 1912 were $370,043,046; expenditures, $385,181,760; and gross debts, $395,207,409. Ten years later taxes collected amounted to $745,000,000 and the gross debt stood at $1,386,430,000. During the next decade, ending with 1932, revenues, expenditures, and indebtedness have continued to mount.

Accurate data for the smaller towns, cities, and subdivisions for taxing purposes are not available, but from such fragmentary data as I have been able to get their record for increased taxes, expenditures, and debts is even worse than for the larger units.

It is clear that this trend can not be allowed to continue without bringing absolute disaster. In many parts of the country taxes are already confiscatory. Unless there is to be a complete socialization of land, we must face about and end it by reducing Government agencies and services to a point where the cost will be brought to a level that the people can afford to pay. That means reorganization, consolidation, and elimination of many of the present activities.

What may be accomplished by a proper reorganization is fairly illustrated by the bill which I introduced in the last Congress providing for the consolidation of the Pension Bureau, the National Home for the Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and the Veterans' Bureau into the Veterans' Administration. I am advised by the director that during the first year of its operation the consolidated administration showed a saving of approximately $12,000,000. As chairman, I introduced and helped secure the passage of a number of other bills that have resulted in substantial economies and improved efficiency. Time will not permit of their discussion here.

The depression itself is in no small measure due to excessive expenditures, unbalanced budgets, and corresponding loss of confidence in our institutions, and the stability of our Government and credit structures. It is because of this that the balancing of the Budget has become indispensable. This has not only compelled the levying of the heaviest taxes our country has ever known in peace time, but have forced economies that have run into the hundreds of millions of dollars for the next fiscal year. The economies and decreases jointly carried out by the President and Congress will run well beyond the $600,000,000 mark for the fiscal year 1933 as compared with 1932, according to the data supplied by the experts of the Appropriations Committee.

In accomplishing this saving no small part of credit is due to the people themselves. Not since I have been in Congress have the taxpayers taken such a vital interest in effecting reductions in Government expenditures as at the present session. This has proceeded to such an extent that in many cases people have rejected with indignation proposed expenditures in their own communities for post-office buildings and other structures not at present needed for the efficient transaction of the Government business. This is a healthy symptom and a great encouragement to those who for years have fought consistently against extravagant and unnecessary Government expenditures.

Government should be simplified. There should be less meddling with the private lives of the people, less paternalism, and less supervision and inspection. Hobbies of minority groups, enthusiasts, and cranks may well be cast aside. It is sufficient that the weak are protected against the strong; that equal opportunity is afforded to all, and that the predatory are held in check.

In the meantime the Government should develop a financial and credit structure of sufficient strength and elasticity to prevent gross inflation on the one hand and a shocking deflation on the other. It is time we are devoting more attention to sound economics and less to relief panaceas that are only temporary and indifferently effective at best. It should be possible to work out our financial, industrial, and agricultural interests in such a manner as to give stability to commodity values, insure employment at fair wages, and prevent recurring booms and corresponding depressions. Until this end is realized we shall not have reached that economic stability to which the people are entitled.

DOCUMENTS TO THE CREDIT OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement of some interest to the Members of the House. Sometime ago I had printed in the RECORD a list of documents that are at the disposal of Members from now until the 1st of December. A good many Members have asked me where this list is to be found and how long ago it was put in. They could not find it. I want to announce to them they will find it in the RECORD of May 23, near the beginning of the RECORD of that day, and they can see there the riches that are in store for them.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE EDWARD E. ESLICK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announces the appointment of the following committee to attend the funeral of the late E. E. ESLICK:

Messrs. BYRNS, DAVIS, MCREYNOLDS, BROWNING, COOPER of Tennessee, CRUMP, MITCHELL, TAYLOR of Tennessee, LOVETTE, COLLIER, CRISP, CULLEN, HAWLEY, BACHARACH, MCCORMACK, VINSON of Kentucky, FISH, and ARNOLD.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, on account of the tragic events which carried from us our beloved colleague yesterday afternoon, I believe it is the consensus of opinion on both sides of the aisle that any further participation in general debate would be very much under a saddened pressure.

I have talked the matter over with the gentlemen who represent the other side, Messrs. HAWLEY and CRISP, and we took it up in the Ways and Means Committee a while ago and it was the unanimous decision of the committee, including the two gentlemen referred to, that I propound a request for a discontinuance of further general debate.

The funeral party leaves this afternoon at around 4 o'clock. The funeral will either have to be postponed or some Members will be deprived of their right to vote on this important question if we continue the general debate and then proceed under the 5-minute rule. I am sure our colleague, who died here in the thick of the fight, would say to the Members that they remain here and vote rather than forego any of their rights, but under the circumstances I feel the Members can extend their remarks in the RECORD, a request which I shall make later, or they can take advantage of the discussion under the 5-minute rule. In this way we can proceed immediately to the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. LOVETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. LOVETTE. I wonder if the gentleman would consider in his request that debate close on the bill at a certain hour in the afternoon, so we will have plenty of time?

Mr. RAGON. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that the bill is short, and under the 5-minute rule I do not think we will have very much discussion.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I therefore propound the unanimous-consent request that further general debate upon the bill providing for the payment of adjusted-service certificates be concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill H. R. 7726 be now concluded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, our colleague who left us yesterday was a brave legislator and he was a friend of the soldiers. I do not believe he would want us to take any action that would jeopardize the rights of the men for whom he spoke.

I want to ask my friend if he believes that the cessation of general debate on this subject will in any way jeopardize the right of the men whose cause this matter represents?

Mr. RAGON. If I thought that, I would not have made the request.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Members he speaks of as having consulted with are against the proposal.

Mr. RAGON. I will say that I was requested by Members who are friends of this bill to make this request. At a meeting this morning they authorized me to see these other gentlemen and make the agreement.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], and my colleague from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] are willing for the debate to end, I shall not interrupt the program; but unless they are willing we ought to continue the debate that has been begun in behalf of these 4,000,000 ex-service men.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentleman that everyone friendly to the bill thought it best for all concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the circumstances, I shall not object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that on yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] did tell me about this proposed suggestion, and inasmuch as I am on the other side, I said I thought it would be all right.

But may I point out that as tragic as was the incident on yesterday, it is our duty to carry on, and while, of course, this may be proper under the circumstances, to dispense with further general debate, it is the duty of the proponents and it is the duty of the opponents to carry on.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the men consulted. We are for this agreement. We will get time under the 5-minute rule. We are not going to sacrifice anything. We are going to pass this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in order to put the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] in a proper attitude, I wish to state that I am sure the gentleman from Arkansas would not have made the request if he had thought it would jeopardize the passage of this bill.

Mr. RAGON. I would like to say this. There was a meeting in the room of the gentleman from Mississippi by 8 or 10 Members who are sponsoring this bill, and they requested me to see the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] and see if arrangements could not be made to close general debate, and I found that both gentlemen had the same view we had.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask all Members on this side, those for and those opposed to the bill, not to oppose this request. I concur with the gentleman from Arkansas that further debate be concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am in perfect accord with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Arkansas, and I think it the proper course to pursue.

I am myself opposed to the bill, but I think it should be speedily passed. I say that because I know it is going to pass this House. [Applause.]

I propose, as far as I am concerned, to let the proponents amend the measure as they see fit. They have the votes to do it, and I shall myself interpose no obstacle that will cause delay. I shall, of course, vote against the bill.

Let me say that the widow of my deceased friend has made a specific request that I attend the funeral of our friend as one of the members of the congressional committee. There is nothing for me to do, of course, but to accede to that request, for I loved him, as I do Mrs. Eslick. I hope the bill can be disposed of before the funeral party is forced to leave this Chamber. Mr. Speaker, if that is not so, inasmuch as we go under the orders of the House, would it be in order by unanimous consent to permit the Members who are to leave here under orders of the House to have their votes recorded on the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is too good a parliamentarian to ask that question. He knows it would not be in accord with the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the request, although it would be establishing a precedent.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7726, to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7726, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the apparent desire of the House to conclude the consideration of this bill at the earliest practical moment. As far as the Chair is concerned, he will endeavor to preserve the rules of the House with reference to the extension of debate upon immaterial amendments. He hopes he may have the cooperation of the membership to that end. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Title V of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof three new sections, to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section, the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is made but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If at the time this section takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509, shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

(When the Clerk had concluded the reading of the first paragraph the following occurred:)

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike out the last word so that the Chair may rule whether we are to read this bill by sections or by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the bill will be read by sections and not by paragraphs. The Clerk will complete the reading of the bill down to section 2, page 4, before any amendment is in order.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the section.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the fact that I was not permitted to speak under general debate, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire to speak unkindly of anyone who is opposed to this legislation. I feel that we have the side of logic and reason, I feel that we can substantiate every part of this bill with information that is sufficient to justify its passage, and I feel that we can satisfactorily answer every objection that has been urged to any part of this bill. Briefly I shall mention to you some of the objections that have been raised and answer them the best I can during the time allotted.

This bill was prepared carefully by the legislative counsel, Mr. Beaman. In the preparation of it he had the assistance of Mr. O'Connor Roberts, counsel for the Veterans' Administration, and Mr. Breuning, of the Veterans' Administration, and also a representative from the Treasury Department. It is true that they did not confer with Mr. Beaman relating to section 2 of the bill, which provides for the manner of payment, but they did confer with and assist him in the preparation of section 1 so that if the bill should become a law it would be the least objectionable to them from the standpoint of administration. I make that statement so that Members may know that the bill was very carefully prepared.

The statement has been made that we are asking for the payment of an obligation that is not due until 1945. I suggest that we are asking that Congress carry out a confession and acknowledgement of an obligation that Congress made in 1924. It is true that we are asking for a revision of part of the contract in order that we may carry out the other part of the contract. The revision we are asking for is this:

In allowing the adjusted-compensation certificates to be issued, instead of dating them back to the time the services were rendered, the certificates were dated 1925, thereby causing the veterans to lose seven and a half years of interest. We are asking for a revision of the contract to that extent. Congress said that there was a difference between what the average soldier, sailor, and marine received during the war for his services and what the lowest paid laborer in America received during the war for his services of between $1 a day and $1.25 a day, and so Congress said that we should pay those veterans an additional sum—not a bonus but adjusted pay—of $1 a day extra pay for home service and $1.25 a day extra pay for services overseas, and we are merely asking that Congress do that which Congress said in 1924 should have been done. We are asking that you pay that debt in the same way that Congress has always paid its debts. For instance, if this pay of $1 a day or $1.25 a day is paid as of the date of service rendered, with a reasonable rate of interest from that time, an amount is now due each veteran who holds an adjusted-service certificate that is equal to 100 per cent of the face value of his certificate. Briefly it is arrived at in this way: When the war was over and people made application for tax refunds, after 10 or 11 years it was finally decided that they were entitled to refunds. The Treasury Department did not make the refunds as of 1925, but as of 1917 and 1918, during the war, during the time they claimed they overpaid their income taxes, or from the time the depreciation of their war facilities occurred, and with 6 per cent interest from that time, which the Government said was a reasonable rate of interest. We are asking that the same policy and the same principle of government which has been adopted for them be adopted for the veterans of the World War. I hope you read the minority report that was written by the 10 members of the Ways and Means Committee. It is available. You can get a copy now if you desire it, and I believe you will be convinced we are not asking for anything except the payment of a debt that Congress has already acknowledged.

But it will be said, "What about the revision part?" Well, have not other people asked for a revision of debts? Did not the foreign countries come to the United States, through their representatives, and ask that their debts be revised, and were those debts not revised by giving those foreign countries more than $10,000,000,000? They used that money to pay their own soldiers, not only bonuses but adjusted compensation, the amounts of which in many instances were as high as $7,209 each.

Without going into that further, I do want to insist that the Members read the minority report.

It has been said that this is fiat money that we are offering to print. It is United States notes, just like you have in your pockets to-day. No more fiat money than that. The Nation's currency which you have in your pockets is backed up by Government bonds. It is the same kind of money that we propose to issue, and it can not be consistently and truthfully said we are proposing to issue fiat money and not, at the same time, call national currency, United States notes, fiat money, because exactly the same principle is involved in issuing those notes. What about Federal reserve notes? That is a case where the Government credit is being used by the bankers in order that currency may be issued, and they get interest on that currency that is issued, every dollar of it. We are just asking that the same privilege be extended to the veterans, but without giving them interest. Instead of giving out bonds and selling them and letting bankers put up those bonds and get money on them, loan the credit to veterans and let them get the money direct. Then the Government will save the interest it would have to pay on the bonds. That is what we propose.

The Goldsborough bill passed this House a few days ago. When it went to the Senate the Senate committee unanimously placed an amendment on that bill permitting the banks of this Nation to put up $1,100,000,000 more bonds, if they want to, with the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury can call up the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and have issued to those bankers $1,100,000,000 of new money—printing-press money—and turn it over to them. While they are getting the use of that money they are also getting the interest on the bonds. We are adopting that same principle, except that we are letting the veterans use the credit of the Nation, and the Government is not out one penny in interest on any bonds. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, we can defend this proposition. It is safe. It is sound. We are not asking you to violate any principle or policy of this Government. We are asking you to carry out and put into execution for the veterans the same principle that you have adopted for others, and especially the bankers. We are not asking you to give any bonus to World War veterans. We are asking you to treat them in the same manner, as far as paying a debt with interest, as you treated the World War profiteers, if you please, who, after the war, were branded as profiteers and traitors by a committee of this Congress.

Further, let me suggest on this money question that you read the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means. I think you will find that information instructive and convincing.

Under leave to extend my remarks, the following is inserted:

Before the end of this session of Congress I expect to insert in the RECORD a statement in answer to every objection urged against this bill. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] presented information that is very misleading. I expect to answer it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] inserted in the RECORD very misleading information. I expect to answer it, as well as the arguments made by other gentlemen who spoke in opposition to the measure. The New York Times has recently published information about the veterans of the World War that is untruthful; in fact, that newspaper has libeled the World War veterans, and I expect to show it in a complete statement.

February 18, 1932, I inserted in the RECORD a statement showing the amount of money that will be paid to the veterans in each county in the United States in the event this bill becomes a law.

MORE MISLEADING INFORMATION

Archibald Roosevelt, of Tea Pot Dome fame, the beneficiary of many Government subsidies and of late the mouthpiece for Wall Street in its fight against veterans, has presented some very misleading information to the public. Wall Street money and influence have caused others to take up the fight and to use the conglomerated misrepresentations presented to the President by Archibald. This is not the first time Archie has been accused of being a lobbyist and messenger for the special interests. When his brother, Theodore, jr., was Assistant Secretary of the Navy under Denby in the famous Harding-Daugherty-Fall administration, Harry Sinclair gave Archibald a very large salary for his messenger and lobbying service; his salary was raised at different times and up to $15,000 a year, although Sinclair later testified he was no good at any kind of work. Sinclair was successful in getting the naval oil lease signed and the United States marines used to clear the property of drilling rigs without the inconvenience of a lawsuit, in which those in charge of the property would have had their day in court.

Archibald presented to the President what was known as a petition for redress of grievances which stated:

> We petition for the reduction of the Federal expenditures by not less than $450,000,000 annually, which these reforms would effect. * * * We make it plain that we are not now speaking of the so-called "bonus," to which we are opposed, but we are speaking of a drastic reduction of the growing annual expenditures in the Federal Budget for veterans of the World War and Spanish-American War. * * *
> A few of the main items of the $928,000,000 annual appropriation are these—

They were enumerated as follows:

(a) Compensation for death during World War service paid to dependents	$36,284,558
(b) Compensation for service-connected disabilities during World War	204,641,848
(c) Retired pay of emergency officers who incurred physical disabilities in line of duty during World War	11,046,040
(d) Disability allowances for veterans of World War for disabilities not connected with their service during World War [1]	104,277,554
Total	356,250,000
Hospitalization	115,528,795
Military and naval insurance	117,000,000
Adjusted-service certificate fund	100,000,000

The petition further states:

> The total of the above and other items for veterans of the World War is approximately $690,000,000. * * * In addition, there is appropriated by the House bill the sum of $225,850,000 for the regular pensions for the veterans of earlier wars, of which amount $116,393,447 is for pensions of veterans of Spanish-American War. * * * The above recitals comprise a few—but a few only—of the facts demonstrating that an immense and growing legalized abuse has been fastened upon the people, which has reached a point which is beyond toleration and demands immediate abatement. * * * Let no one assert that these petitioners desire to deprive any man who has served his country in military service of his just due. We advocate not merely just but liberal treatment of the dependents of all who lost their lives in war service and for all who suffered disability in war service. What we oppose is the payment of the great sums which are being disbursed to or for those who suffered no physical detriment in the war—a system which saps the resources of the people and creates a specially favored class receiving a great subsidy from the people at large. * * * Your petitioners make these representations with respect but with the firm resolve that this vast legalized abuse must be abated and that this grievance of the people must be redressed. (May 4, 1932, signed by Archibald Roosevelt and 131 others, constituting what they called the National Economy Committee, 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City.)

Let us analyze this petition. A saving of $450,000,000 a year is demanded in expenditures for veterans of the World War and Spanish-American War. It is wondered why the same reductions should not be requested for veterans of the Civil War and their dependents who fall in the same class; they are specifically excluded.

The petition does not include the so-called bonus, so we will eliminate from our consideration the $100,000,000. Military and naval insurance was paid for by the veterans with their own money. (Remember the song, "We get $30 a month, deducting $29"?) Therefore, the $117,000,000 should be excluded from consideration. Non-service-connected cases are not entitled to hospitalization unless there is a vacant bed in the hospital not needed by a service-connected case. It is presumed that the expense to the Government will be very little more if all the beds are filled, since the overhead expenses, including salaries and expenses of doctors, nurses, clerks, maintenance and upkeep of buildings, etc., must be paid anyway. Certainly medical and hospital care should not be denied men who suffered injuries in battle and other war injuries and diseases. Therefore, we will exclude from consideration the reduction of $115,528,795 for this service. The hospitals are maintained for service-connected cases.

[1] Many veterans are in this class who have service-connected cases but were unable to make the proof as required by law due to destruction of their records on battlefield and other reasons.

The following items will have to bear the $450,000,000 reduction:

Death compensation	$36,284,558
Compensation, service-connected cases	204,641,848
Emergency officers	11,046,040
Disability allowance	104,277,554
Pensions, Spanish-American War veterans	116,393,447
Total	472,743,447

The petitioners should have been more frank and demanded that no compensation or pensions be paid to honorably discharged veterans of the World War and Spanish-American War for death or service-connected cases, or for any other purpose, since they demanded a reduction which, if allowed, would practically eliminate all these benefits.

Archie says that the veterans are a "specially favored class receiving a great subsidy" and that "this vast legalized abuse must be abated and that this grievance must be redressed." Let us see if Archie and the four M's who are really behind this petition are in a position to grieve about the Government paying subsidies to anyone. The four M's represent Morgan, Mellon, Mills, and Myers, depicting mortgages, misery, misfortune, and malfeasance.

Archie and J. P. Morgan are interested in steamship lines. The lines were purchased from the Government for a very small price. They received a subsidy from the Government in the purchase of the vessels. The Government did require certain payments to be made over a period of 20 years. However, the Government gave them contracts to carry the mail in their steamships. They are being paid as high as $25,000 a trip for carrying 1 or 2 pounds of letters. One of their lines has a 10-year contract to carry the mail from Baltimore to Hamburg. The first few months of their first year this line rendered a service for the Government in carrying the mail that other steamship lines would have rendered for not to exceed $15,000. This company was paid under its liberal contract with the Government the sum of $807,246, or a subsidy of $792,246 for this service.

Another Morgan-Roosevelt line has a very liberal contract with the Government to carry ocean mail. It receives a similar subsidy. This line borrowed $15,750,000 from the Government's Shipping Board. The date of the loan was May 24, 1930, and it will mature in 20 years. The interest rate is one-half of 1 per cent, or 50 cents for the use of every $100 of the Government's money for one year. Contrast this with the $4.50 and $6 on the $100 paid by the veterans for the use of their own money.

The Government is paying out more than $18,000,000 a year, in excess of what other steamship lines would render the service for, to the Morgans, Roosevelts, and others who are talking about subsidies to veterans.

Who compose the National Economy Committee, 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City? The Anti-Bonus League was organized in 1922 with money furnished by war profiteers. It was shown at the hearings on the bills to pay adjusted compensation to veterans that it received its principal contributions from Mellon companies and from Mr. A. W. Mellon himself. A congressional committee disclosed facts which are convincing that Mr. Mellon was a war profiteer and this committee suggested a change in the Constitution of the United States in order that men guilty of such reprehensible conduct in time of war may be punished for treason—in other words, shot at sunrise.

The Mellon name made the Anti-Bonus League offensive to patriotic, law-abiding citizens. Then the same gentlemen organized the Committee to Reduce the Cost of Peace. It was shown before the Ways and Means Committee less than 60 days ago that this organization came into being to take the place of Mellon's Anti-Bonus League and was engaged in opposing veteran legislation. Another wolf in sheep's clothing. This publicity caused another change of name to be desirable. The same gentlemen who were so active in the former organizations helped to bring into being this new National Economy Committee, which also has the support of the Morgans and Roosevelts.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert such portions of my testimony before the Ways and Means Committee as I think will be material.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The testimony is as follows:

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

MONDAY, April 11, 1932.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, you may present your first witness. We will hear Mr. PATMAN.

STATEMENT OF HON. WRIGHT PATMAN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we appreciate the fact that this committee has worked very hard in the last few months. I do not suppose there has been a committee of Congress that has worked as hard and as faithfully as the Ways and Means Committee of the House. We do not want unduly to burden you. We appreciate the fact that you have given us this opportunity to present our side of the case, and any arrangements that the committee makes as to time for these hearings will meet with our entire satisfaction. We shall certainly try to conform to the wishes of the committee in every way in order that the committee may be convenienced.

Senator THOMAS has been invited to appear before the committee by myself and other members of the House as well as by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Ex-Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, is here. He has been invited to be a witness. Senator Owen can not be present after this morning. In fact, he remained over at our request, in order to make his appearance this morning. I hope the committee will hear him after I have finished. For that reason I expect to cut the time of my presentation as much as possible.

Dr. Willford I. King, the head economist of New York University, who recently appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee, will be a witness for the proponents of this legislation. He can be here Thursday or Saturday, and in accordance with the suggestion of the chairman this morning, we suggest Thursday would be the best day. I have asked the clerk of the committee to send him a telegram inviting him to be here next Thursday.

Senator THOMAS has also suggested that the committee should hear Mr. Le Blanc, who has a reputation as an economist, not only here in our own country, but internationally. We have requested that he be invited to appear. Also Mr. Harris, of Harris & Volts, of New York. We ask that he be invited.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PATMAN. In the beginning, I want to say to this committee that unless we can show that the payment of these adjusted-service certificates will benefit the country, promote the general welfare, we are not entitled to win; we are not entitled to have this bill pass.

It is true that the veterans need this money. More than 2,000,000 of them are out of jobs. But, at the same time, they realize that in order for them to be helped it must be done on the theory that it will promote the general welfare. If it will not promote the general welfare, if it will be the least bit detrimental to the general welfare, we are not entitled to ask this committee to pass or to approve this legislation.

Now, I say that 2,000,000 veterans are unemployed. That is a misstatement in this: Mr. John Arthur Shaw, who is director of the Unemployment Service of the Department of Labor, told me—and I have his statement in the record—that 750,000 able-bodied veterans are unemployed. They are able, willing, and anxious to work and can not find jobs. More than 75,000 men who have disabilities not sufficient to disqualify them for work, are unable to find jobs, although willing to work. There are 800,000 veterans, so Mr. Shaw tells me, who are working from one to three days a week at greatly reduced wages and, of course, are not making sufficient money to pay their actual running expenses, to obtain the comforts and necessities of life for themselves and their families. That, of course, aggregates almost 2,000,000 veterans.

By reason of the fact that there are 3,666,000 of these certificates, and that all except 800,000, approximately, of the veterans have borrowed on those certificates, and further in view of the fact that 200,000 of those 800,000 can not borrow because their certificates are not two years old, I think that is pretty good proof that at least four-fifths of the veterans are in need of this money.

Two hundred thousand can not borrow. Taking 200,000 from 800,000, approximately—I am not attempting to quote the exact figures—would indicate that there are only about 600,000 who have not borrowed because they did not want the money.

The question receiving the most consideration at this time in regard to this legislation, throughout the country and among the veterans, is, Can the payment to the veterans on a debt that must be paid anyway be used as a vehicle to carry our country back to prosperity?

In order to persuade Congress to pass a bill of this nature, we realize we must present proof to show that the face or maturity value of these certificates are due; at least, that the veterans would be entitled to a sum equal to the full face or maturity value of these certificates now; that is, considering that the Government does not have to invoke a new principle in order to do that. Here is the way we arrive at that conclusion:

Congress had hearings before committees for many months, over a period of some three or four years. During this time, the committees of Congress finally agreed—their reports disclosed and the debates in the House disclosed—that there was a difference, after charging the veteran with the amount of the pay that he received and his clothing and board, all of which should be added, of course, in arriving at the total amount, and deducting his daily wages from the lowest wages paid to a civilian laborer during the war, of a dollar and a dollar and twenty-five cents per day. You will find those figures in the committee reports in support of one of these bills. Therefore Congress agreed that there was a difference, as I say, of a dollar and a dollar and twenty-five cents a day that should be paid to the veteran.

After many proposals were suggested, the committee finally agreed upon one plan, the adjusted-service certificate form of payment. That is to say, suppose a man served a certain length of time, 200 days overseas. That would be computed at the rate of a dollar and twenty-five cents a day; also 210 days here at one dollar, making $210, or a total of $460. Now, instead of giving that man $460, the Government gave him an adjusted-service certificate equal to $1,000, and the amount of that certificate was arrived at in this way:

They said, "Well, we have already paid you $60. We paid you that $60 when you came out of the service. Therefore we are going to deduct the $60 from your $460. But we are going to add 25 per cent for waiting, since you are going to have to wait a number of years in order to get your money. Twenty-five per cent of $400 makes $100, which, added to the $400, makes a total of $500. We will give you an adjusted-service certificate equal to what the $500 would pay for if you were going to purchase an endowment policy from a private life-insurance company. In an average case that would amount to $1,000."

So the man who was entitled to $460 got an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000. Now, we are asking that this payment be made as of the time the services were rendered, with a reasonable rate of interest to be computed from that time. We do that on the theory that the Government has invoked that principle for others; that it has always been the policy of the Government to pay in that way.

For instance, let us take one who served his country during the time of the war by making war munitions and supplies. He had all of his factory facilities engaged in war work. He paid an income tax in 1917. After the war was over he filed an application asking the Government of the United States to allow him a refund on his income tax for 1917 because he had failed to deduct a sufficient amount for depreciation of his war facilities during 1917. If he had deducted a sufficient amount, he would be entitled, let us say, to a $460 tax refund. The Government would give him that refund and the Government would give him that refund not as of 1925 but as of the time he paid his income taxes, March 15, 1918, with 6 per cent interest from that time, on the theory that if he had not paid a sufficient income tax and had an assessment levied against him by the Government he would have had to pay 6 per cent interest from that time. Therefore the Government turns around and says if it is fair for you, it is fair for us. The law says you must pay us 6 per cent from March 15, 1918. We will invoke that same principle in this case.

It does not seem to me to be unreasonable, and you may say what is a reasonable rate of interest?

For years and years the Government caused the veterans to pay 6 and 7 and 8 per cent interest. That interest was compounded annually on the money that they received as loans on their certificates. If it was fair and reasonable for them to pay 6 and 7 and 8 per cent interest compounded annually on their certificates, is it not at least fair that the Government pay them at the minimum rate from the time the services were rendered?

That is exactly what we are asking for, and no more. We are not asking for the 25 per cent. We are asking you to exclude that—take it out. That is the only bonus that is in that certificate—that 25 per cent; and we are asking you to take it out. Just give the veterans a dollar and a dollar and twenty-five cents to-day as of the time the services were rendered, with that reasonable rate of interest from that time, the minimum rate at which the Government charged the veteran over that period of years, and each veteran is entitled to receive an amount from the Government equal to the face or maturity value of his adjusted-service certificates, October 1, 1931. I have actually taken my pencil and figured it out myself. Others have figured it out, and if you agree with what I have said, there is no question about the amount.

Now, we do not think that a bond issue is the proper way to handle this proposition. We feel it would be detrimental to the country at this time to have a bond issue. I think it must be handled in another way. I think that a bond issue would be so detrimental to the country that we would not be justified in asking for it. Therefore, no bond issue is being proposed, no bond issue is being asked.

I am not going to quote exact figures here, because General Hines is present and he has the figures in his possession, although I got those figures from his office a few days ago and I will refer to them in a general way.

The number of holders of certificates is 3,539,507 of the amount of $3,513,000,000. About 3 per cent of the population of any community are holders of these certificates; about 4 per cent are veterans. The veteran population bears a very definite ratio to the total population of any community, county, or State. You can always arrive at the number of veterans in any community who are holders of certificates by taking 3 per cent of the entire population of that community.

These certificates range in value from $126 to $1,590 each. The average certificate amounts to $1,000.

Two million six hundred and seventy-nine thousand seven hundred and forty-four have borrowed the limit allowed by law, 50 per cent. Now, the argument is being made that they are unpatriotic in asking for the remainder; that they should sit idly by and allow the Government to liquidate those certificates in 1945.

If more money is put into circulation, prices of commodities will rise. The country will be destroyed if we try to adjust our living standards to present prices.

In connection with the question of whether or not the veterans are unpatriotic, let us see what they will get in 1945 if these certificates are not paid now.

You have over 2,000,000 men who need this money for the comforts and necessities of life. They need it to buy clothing and food for themselves and for their families. It is all right to tell them they should be patriotic. They are patriotic. They manifested their patriotism in the past. But it is awfully hard to convince them that it is right for them to sit idly by and see their families and themselves suffer while the Government is consuming the remainder of their certificates in compound interest. That is something that is very difficult to understand.

Let us see what these veterans will get. We will take the average certificate of a thousand dollars where a veteran has borrowed the limit allowed by law. He got his money in little dribs until the 50 per cent loan act was passed, and then he got a substantial sum. If he pays 4½ per cent interest compounded annually from now until 1945, let us see what he will have. He can not borrow any more money until 1944, and then he will be permitted to borrow $16.55. The next year, 1945, the Government will settle with him and will pay him $66.25, and the certificate will be canceled. But all the veterans are not so fortunate as to receive even that sum. Some of them will continue to pay 6 per cent interest, compounded annually, because they borrowed from the banks, and the banks at the end of six months have turned their certificates in to the Veterans' Administration.

It is the ruling of the Veterans' Administration that where a veteran borrowed from a bank, using his adjusted-service certificate as collateral, and pays the banks 4½ per cent interest, compounded annually, as the present law requires, such a veteran will be required to pay 6 per cent interest, compounded annually, on this loan when the bank transfers it to the Government at the end of six months. This will result in the veteran who is the holder of a certificate of the average amount, $1,000, being indebted to the Government in the sum of $112.18 on the date of the maturity of his certificate in 1945.

The following table is based upon an assumed case. It is assumed that the veteran has a certificate for $1,000; that it was dated January 1, 1925, and made payable January 1, 1945; average age of 33 at the time of issuance; that loans were made by a bank in the eleventh (Texas) Federal reserve district each year on January 1, from 1927 to 1931, inclusive, then a loan on March 1, 1931, for the 50 per cent loan value and redemption of the note by the Government in six months:

[1] At this point the amount of principal and interest due on account of the amount paid the bank on Sept. 1, 1931, would exceed the face value of the certificate.

The above tabulation was prepared by the Veterans' Administration at my request and forwarded to me by Gen. Frank T. Hines.

By deducting the amount of cash received by the veteran from the amount of interest due by the veteran it will be discovered that the veteran will owe the Government $112.18 instead of the Government owing him one penny.

Veterans who have borrowed on their certificates are paying $166,000 a day interest.

A veteran of the average age, who was 33 years of age January 1, 1925, received from the Government an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000, the average value. He has borrowed on the certificate every opportunity and will continue to do so as a majority of the veterans have done. He will not repay any part of the principal or make any interest payments. The following computation furnished by the Veterans' Administration shows the amount the veteran receives in cash, the amount of compound interest charged, and other information:

[1] Interest at maximum rate of 6 per cent to March, 1931, and maximum of 4½ per cent after March, 1931.

It will be noticed that the veteran will receive less than $100 more on his certificate than the Government will receive in interest; or will receive $49.80 more than one-half the value of his certificate.

Only one substantial payment has been or will be made on the certificate. The other payments are in dribs and not sufficient to afford substantial relief for any purpose. After the 50 per cent loan is granted the remainder of the certificate will be practically consumed by compound interest. His next loan will be granted January 1, 1944, for $16.55. The Government does not pay compound interest for the money it borrows.

Now, it is awfully hard to convince people, 2,000,000 of them who need this money for the purposes for which they do need it, that in order to be patriotic they must sit idly by and let the balance of this certificate be consumed by compound interest and not say a word about it. It is awfully hard to convince them that that is the right thing to do.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ESLICK. Do you mean that where veterans have borrowed from banks on the basis of 6 per cent interest, and that certificate is turned in to the Government, it continues to bear a 6 per cent interest rate?

Mr. PATMAN. I mean that where he has borrowed on the basis of 6 or 4½ per cent and the bank turns it in to the Government, as I understand it, there was one section of the law that was not changed—possibly the Congress intended to change it, but it did not change it—when it is turned in to the Government at the end of six months, counsel for the Veterans' Administration has held that they must pay 6 per cent from then on. Am I right about that, General Hines?

General HINES. That is right. One section of the law, Mr. Chairman, requires that whenever the Government redeems a loan from the bank the certificate went into the adjusted-service certificate fund and the veterans paid 6 per cent interest. We have submitted the matter to the comptroller, hoping that he might agree with the feeling that I have—that while Congress did not specifically change that provision, we felt that when they expressed the wish that they pay not more than 4½ per cent it was the intention to apply it to the entire law, though they did not apply it. There was one provision that was not amended, although it was mentioned at the time. If the comptroller will agree with the Veterans' Administration, we will continue at 4½ per cent under that provision, although technically and legally I feel sure the provision is correct and requires 6 per cent.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. The comptroller has not yet rendered a decision?

General HINES. He has not yet rendered a ruling. In the event he feels there is not sufficient law the Veterans' Administration would be favorable to a change in that provision.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the general a question?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. MCCORMACK. You state technically and legally it is correct?

General HINES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCORMACK. But from the practical angle it is incorrect?

General HINES. No. From the practical angle it would be much simpler, administratively, to have them all at 4½ per cent. The law is quite specific. The provision is not ambiguous.

Mr. PATMAN. Thank you, General. At any rate, the law as it is now means that the veterans are being charged 6 per cent. I have statements in my office that disclose that and there is no question about it. Of course, as the general says, if the comptroller does not agree with him that the law should be changed, they will probably continue to do it.

Mr. BACHARACH. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACHARACH. How many of the veterans are paying 6 per cent?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, not so many; just those who borrowed through the banks.

Mr. BACHARACH. You do not know the number?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know the number, but it is a small number. If the gentlemen will pardon me, I would like not to be diverted at this point.

Mr. BACHARACH. Surely.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not have to yield for any question if he does not desire.

Mr. PATMAN. The main feature of this proposition at this time is what I would call the reflation feature. Inflation is putting too much money in circulation; deflation is taking out too much. Reflation is restoring the amount of money that should not have been taken out, in order to bring the country back to prosperity.

I will admit it is not so much the volume of money that makes a prosperous country as it is the velocity of the money and credits. Since 1929 the velocity of money and credits has decreased 50 per cent. There is only one way to make up for lack of velocity and that is by increasing the volume of money. We are hopeful in asking for the passage of this legislation that this will not only pay these certificates but that it will put sufficient money in circulation to cause commodity prices to rise, and when commodity prices rise money will be brought out of hoarding, because there will be some incentive to bring money out.

The manufacturer manufacturing his goods on the basis of a certain wage scale, by purchasing his raw materials at a certain price, can see a little profit in the transaction. There will be some incentive for him to put men back to work in the factory to produce goods. As it is now, the manufacturer of these goods, if he were to set about manufacturing them, by the time they were manufactured and sent out on a declining market, would lose money. Therefore the best thing to do is to lay off men and cut down their force and save as much of the expenses as possible. But, with a rising market, there is every incentive for them to put men back to work. That will restore the prosperity of our country.

Well, you will ask, "How much money should be put into circulation?" I am not going to try to answer that. We are going to have economists here who will answer that. But I do make this statement, that I do not think it is possible that the amount of money to be put into circulation will be too much. The question in my mind is, It it enough? I doubt that it is.

The people are being reduced to barter. Down in Houston, Tex., the other day I read a great big advertisement that said, "Mr. Farmer, you have no money; neither have we. We have gas and oil. You have chickens. Bring your chickens and we will trade you gas and oil for them." People do not have enough money with which to do business. Something has got to be done to get money out among the masses.

It is true that the President of the United States and other patriotic people in our Nation have been striving to get money out into circulation, sufficient for people to do business with. But to my mind it has not yet percolated down to the masses, and it does not look as though it is going to percolate down to the masses. Our theory is you must start with the masses and let the money go upward. If you will put purchasing power in the hands of the consumer, in the hands of people who have the consuming power but do not have the purchasing power, you will cause goods to be bought. You will see these veterans and their families in the stores the next morning buying clothing and hats and shoes and food for them to eat. You will see a demand for goods; and with a demand for goods and other things, there will be an incentive for manufacturers to borrow some money and get back to manufacturing. As it is now, why should a man borrow money from the bank, even if the bank is willing to lend it to him? He has no business into which to put money that will make him money. There is a declining market. There must be something done to cause or to bring about a rising market.

I have a letter from a man who visited 97 Kansas towns and cities. He called on the drug stores. He said that he started out against this proposal. He said that these gentlemen on whom he called were not particularly for the veteran, but they wanted this money in circulation. He said without exception those 97 managers of those drug stores said that the only salvation to this country was to pass this bill and get this money in circulation so that there would be enough money with which to do business.

These are all typical letters. I have another letter here from a merchant down in Texas. He is not even remotely connected with the veterans, but he says that unless something is done to get money out to the masses of the country in this country that we are in a deplorable condition.

A banker from Oklahoma says that the people have maintained their poise remarkably well, but unless something is done in the very near future to get this money out among the masses, he does not know what is going to happen in a very short time. It is a dangerous situation.

The Federal reserve system is buying some Government bonds, but who gets that money? The people who hold these bonds are already buying as much as they want to buy. They are not going to buy an extra pair of shoes or an extra hat or an extra suit of clothes because the Federal reserve system has issued to them those Federal reserve notes that would circulate as currency. They already have plenty. But if that money can reach the masses, the people who are in need of these things but do not have the purchasing power, there will be a great incentive for them to buy, and of course that will help conditions generally.

I have talked to many economists about this, and I believe that this theory is sound, that we can issue paper currency for the difference that is due on these certificates. I believe that we can issue United States notes. I have referred to them as United States Treasury notes, but it makes no difference how you refer to them. But in order to make them the same as the money we now have outstanding, that should be changed to United States notes. The same principle is involved.

We have this prejudice to overcome. They will say, "Look at the inflation in Europe, in Russia, in the South American republics. How are you going to overcome that?"

Well, we do not expect to start out here on any kind of a program that would cause such wild inflation as occurred in Germany. We do not expect to try to put 5 tons on a 1-ton truck. We do not expect to try to issue several times as much money as this country needs. It will be all right with us to tie to a 40 per cent gold base and just say that the policy of this Government is, as it has been in the past, that we would never issue currency that will be in excess of a 40 per cent gold base.

I believe it is sound, and I believe that many economists in the United States will say so. But here is the prejudice. They will say, "Take the Civil War; think about the greenbacks." They went down to almost nothing; and some of our friends claim now that those greenbacks were backed by 40 per cent gold, which, of course, was a mistake. They were not backed by 40 per cent gold. And in support of that I want to insert an excerpt from the Encyclopædia Americana, page 427, volume 13, on the greenbacks issued during the Civil War.

"February 25, 1862, $150,000,000 authorized; not receivable for import dues nor payable by the Government as interest on its obligations.

"June 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, further issues were authorized; and on January 3, 1864, they reached their maximum amount of $449,338,902. The great inflation, the uncertain fortunes of the war, and the belief that even if victorious the United States neither could nor would pay its enormous debt at face value, but would reduce or scale it, combined to depreciate the value of the notes; throughout 1864 they were worth on an average only about 45 cents on the dollar, and on one day, July 11, when Early was threatening Washington, they dropped in panic to about 35 cents."

Mr. PATMAN. That statement shows that these greenbacks were not backed by any 40 per cent gold. They had nothing behind them. All they had behind them was the credit of this Nation; and when General Early, of the Southern Confederacy, was about to take Washington, this article discloses, the credit of the Nation was impaired, and when the credit of the Nation was impaired the greenbacks went down to 35 cents on the dollar. But when the war was over and Secretary of the Treasury Sherman issued an order that "hereafter these greenbacks shall not only be good for certain debts that are specified, but they shall be good for all debts"—I sent to the Library and got a copy of that order; it was issued in 1879—from that time on those greenbacks remained at 100 cents on the dollar, and they have never gone down. In 1900 there were $346,000,000 worth of these greenbacks, and Congress set aside $156,000,000 as a gold reserve, and since that time they have had a gold reserve of 40 per cent behind those United States notes.

Well, there is nothing else behind them. There is no 60 per cent eligible paper behind them. That is the same principle that we want you to invoke here, except that the other 60 per cent in our case will be backed by Government obligations—these service certificates that are held by veterans of the World War. Now, if United States notes are fiat money—of course, our plan would probably be called fiat money; but our plan is no more fiat money than any other paper currency that is now being circulated in this Nation, except the gold certificates which are 100 cents on the dollar.

Now, we have $4,000,000,000 worth of gold coins in this Nation. That statement can be verified by reports from the Treasury Department. Four billion dollars worth of gold is enough to justify the issuance of $10,000,000,000 worth of currency. But do we have $10,000,000,000 worth of currency in circulation? No; we have five and a half billion dollars worth of currency in circulation. So it is not the gold standard of 40 per cent that our Nation is suffering from, but it is the double gold standard that we are suffering from. If you would just issue money as long as you had a 40 per cent gold base, we would have plenty of money in circulation; and I venture to suggest that this depression, if it happened at all, certainly would not have been so harmful and detrimental as it has been if that money had been issued.

I want to insert in the record some excerpts from statements recently gotten up by economists from Cornell University, Doctors Pearson and Warren.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Without objection, they will go in the record.

Mr. PATMAN. Here is one statement:

"The unemployment in the United States is variously estimated at from six to eight millions.

"Since 1929 the decline in prices in England, France, Germany, Italy, have been very similar: France, 33 per cent; England, 28; Italy, 27; United States, 26; and Germany, 22.

"Since 1929 prices in China have risen 8 per cent. China is on a silver basis. In the same period prices in gold-using countries have declined from 22 to 33 per cent. At the same time that other countries are feeling the effects of declining prices China is feeling the effects of rising prices. There is full employment and profits are large. It does not follow that the prices in the gold-using countries would have been the same as the prices in China had these countries been on a silver basis. The use of any metal as money changes the demand for it and hence changes its value."

Here is a statement about the debts of the country, private and public—a statement to the effect that all debts amount to about $203,000,000,000. Therefore this $2,000,000,000 that we are asking to put in circulation would only represent about 1 per cent of the total public and private debts, and certainly 1 per cent would not be too much.

[3] Ryan, F. W., Family Finance in the United States, the Journal of Business of the University of Chicago, Vol. III, No. 4, pt. 1, p. 404, October, 1930.

"The decline in commodity prices has resulted in many business failures. During the last two years 3,635 banks have suspended, with deposits of $2,624,000,000. In the same period, 54,640 business failures have occurred, with liabilities of $1,405,000,000.

"EFFECT OF DECLINING PRICES ON HOME OWNERS

"The home owner's security is in the value of a home. If commodity prices fall so that the home can be built for 25 per cent less than he paid, his equity is gone unless he paid more than 25 per cent down. But when all the bankrupt properties are thrown on the market, buyers disappear as if by magic, and the multitude of sellers depress prices so that an owner who paid 50 per cent down may see his equity disappear. In such a time it is well to remember that well-constructed, well-located homes have a permanent value even if they are unsalable for a time."

Mr. PATMAN. Now, these farmers during good times voted bonds to build schoolhouses and construct roads and make other public improvements. They did it on the basis of 20-cent cotton and more than a dollar a bushel for wheat. Now, the citizen who holds these bonds does not have a right to take a hundred-dollar bond of that farmer and strike out "$100" and put "$400" there; neither does the bondholder have a right to strike out "6 per cent interest" and put "24 per cent interest" there. But by reason of contracting the currency, and by reason of the low velocity of money and credits, the dollar has become so dear that it is equal to that same thing—those farmers having to pay $400 instead of $100 in commodities, and 24 per cent interest instead of 6 per cent interest.

So before we can ever get this country back, I plead with you that something must be done to put money in circulation, and new money that will stimulate trade and cause commodity values to rise, in order that people may be able to pay their debts.

Doctor Pearson and Doctor Warren say:

I have here a statement of monetary gold. This statement is from 1880 down to date. The first column shows the total money in circulation; the next is the monetary gold coin and bullion; the next, the total monetary circulation; the next is the individual deposits; then the percentage of gold to total money; and then the monetary circulation per dollar of gold.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

"Whenever the countries again establish a free gold basis, the tendency to hoard gold will be greater than before the war.

"Banks in the United States and in other countries will, for some years, wish to maintain a liquid position so that they will not again be called on to sell securities at a loss in order to get cash. This means that high cash reserves will be held.

"In some regions, there is a shortage of banks so that a much larger amount of money will be kept in homes than formerly was the case. For some time, fear of banks will increase the tendency to keep cash rather than bank accounts.

"Because of low profits, many banks are introducing a charge for checks. This will tend to reduce the number of small accounts and reduce payments by check."

Mr. PATMAN. By looking at this chart you will find that since 1880 the monetary circulation per dollar of gold has gone down from $2.17 to 97 cents. In other words, we have more gold than we have currency in circulation. It is not the 40 per cent gold standard that is hurting us, but it is that 80 and 100 per cent gold standard that has been causing us so much trouble.

I think the members of the committee will find this statement to be very interesting. It was prepared by Doctors Pearson and Warren, of Cornell University.

I have another statement here from the same gentlemen. They say:

"Beginning in May, 1920, prices which were 244 per cent of prewar started to decline, and did not stop until prices reached 136 in June, 1921. This was the beginning of the agricultural depression, of which the end is not yet in sight."

This was just prepared a short time ago.

"Tens of thousands of young men returned from France married, went in debt, and started farming. Many are now paying interest on a debt that it is impossible for them to liquidate."

So, in inflating the currency and in cheapening the dollar, so to speak, you are permitting people to pay their debts; some of them on the same basis that those debts were contracted. You will say, "Yes, but won't the creditor receive less?" Possibly so; but it is better to receive less than nothing at all. You will say, "Won't the man who has fixed wages receive less in commodities for his dollars?" Yes, he will receive less; but it is better for him to receive less than not to have any dollars to buy those commodities with. So I suggest to you, my friends, that one of the main reasons for the passage of this legislation is for the reflation feature that is involved, in order that money may be put into circulation and people will have sufficient money to do business on.

The Federal Reserve Bulletin for March, 1932, has this statement in it. I will not read the whole statement, but will just read the conclusion:

"On the basis of these excess reserves, the Federal reserve banks could issue $3,500,000,000 of credit if the demand were for currency, and $4,000,000,000 if it were for deposits at the reserve banks."

There is plenty of money right there if you want to change this plan and adopt some plan similar to Senator THOMAS's. The Federal Reserve Board says they have got sufficient gold reserves to justify the issuance of three and a half billion dollars more money, and it could safely be done that way. But what we want to do is to convert $2,000,000,000 noncirculating Government obligation into a $2,000,000,000 circulating obligation. Government bonds do not circulate and they do not affect the price level; but United States notes as currency will circulate, and they will affect the price level. And this country, I repeat, can not possibly come back until something is done to cause commodity prices to rise.

You will say, "What about impairing the credit of our great Nation?" Permit me to suggest—not for the purpose of suggesting that we should be extravagant—that $400,000,000,000 represents the national wealth of our Nation. Four hundred billion dollars. I received that information lately, from the best source, I guess, in the antihoarding drive that is being conducted through the newspapers. Representations were made by the committee appointed by the President of the United States that the wealth of our Nation is $400,000,000,000. What is the debt? How much are the debts? We owe $18,000,000,000. That is the ratio, you might say, of 22½ to 1, or equal to a $22,500 business owing $1,000. That is the ratio.

Now, our indebtedness is only 4 per cent of our national wealth. After the Civil War it was 10½ per cent. Of course, that is no reason why we should increase it, but it is just to let you know that we should not be alarmed about it now. France owes 20 per cent of her national wealth and England owes 40 per cent of her national wealth.

I mention that not for the purpose of encouraging extravagance, but to let you know that in these arguments that are being made that the credit of our Nation is being impaired, certainly those gentlemen should take into consideration the wealth of our Nation and the indebtedness against it before making such statements as that.

Now, if members of the committee desire to ask me any questions, I shall do my very best to answer them.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions?

Mr. HILL. Mr. PATMAN, you speak of issuing about $2,000,000,000 of United States notes on the basis of the monetary gold that the United States now has. How much monetary gold have we in the United States?

Mr. PATMAN. We have $4,000,000,000 in this country.

Mr. HILL. I mean in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. PATMAN. In the Treasury of the United States. I do not know the exact amount now, but I can take one item and show you where you can get enough from that one item alone.

There is $1,600,000,000 worth of gold certificates outstanding. They are backed 100 per cent by gold. Six hundred million dollars would back those 40 per cent. There is a billion dollars of idle gold right there that would justify the issuance of two and one-half billion dollars in currency.

You will say, "Is 40 per cent enough?" Two per cent is enough on your bank checks. When you put your money in a bank, if 2 per cent of the depositors go there and get their money, the other 98 per cent have not got any money there. Two per cent is enough for the banks. Certainly 40 per cent ought to be enough for the Nation.

We have other witnesses here who will be heard on that question.

Now, of course, Mr. CONNERY, of Massachusetts, is one of the proponents of this legislation, and Mr. RANKIN and Mr. KVALE also, and they want to be heard; but I would like for Senator Owen to be heard at this time, if the members of the committee have no objection.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that Mr. PATMAN yield to Senator Owen, because I would like to ask him several questions, and I do not want to take the time now

Mr. PATMAN. I will yield to Senator Owen. Will that be satisfactory, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to ask Mr. PATMAN one question. Mr. PATMAN referred to a very interesting incident in Texas, where some oil and gas people advertised to the farmers, describing a situation something like this: "Here is gas and oil that we would like to sell, and you have calves and chickens that you want to sell, but neither of us has any money; so bring in your calves and chickens and we will give you oil and gas for them." Do you know anything more about that incident and what its developments were?

Mr. PATMAN. No; I do not. I know that it is very inconvenient for people to exist without money as a medium of exchange.

Mr. LEWIS. There were not further developments?

Mr. PATMAN. No. Advertisements have been appearing in the Houston papers. By the way, you know, oil in east Texas has been cheaper than water in west Texas during the last few months.

Mr. RAINEY. Are you going to have some witness on the stand who can give us the exact amount of the gold reserve, the exact amount of Treasury notes and certificates, and how much is held against them, and why?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. Or do you want me to ask you those questions?

Mr. PATMAN. If it is not developed by Senator Owen's testimony, or one other witness that we have, I will get those figures from the Treasury report. They are available.

Mr. RAINEY. But you will have a witness?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; we will have one.

Mr. RAINEY. From whom we can get those figures?

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAINEY. And you would prefer to have me wait and get that testimony from him?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. And what witness will that be?

Mr. PATMAN. I think Senator Owen will be able to give you those figures.

Mr. RAINEY. All right.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. PATMAN, if you will excuse yourself, we will hear Senator Owen and you may come back later.

Mr. PATMAN. In regard to the issuance of the money, I just merely want to make this statement. I presume the committee realizes that we are about to close this case, and I just wanted to mention some of the things that have happened.

The money that would be issued under the plan I have proposed would be like this money that is known as United States notes. There would be no way to distinguish that money from any other money, and it would be backed by the same amount of gold that United States notes are backed by. There would be no reason on earth why it should depreciate in value and other money would not depreciate in value. It would be convertible into gold the same as United States notes are convertible into gold under that 1891 act.

Mr. RAGON. May I ask the gentleman some questions when you get through?

Mr. PATMAN. May I finish this one comment, if the gentleman will permit?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, there are three plans that I think this committee will probably seriously consider, and I know that all the members of the committee have been very nice and considerate, and for myself and for those who are interested in this cause, we desire now to thank you, each and all of you, for the careful and courteous consideration that you have given to this cause. We know that you are just as anxious to do with is right as we are. You have the interest of the people just as much at heart as we have. We do not question your motives or intentions now, neither will we question your motives or intentions if you were to decide against us in this case.

But, in concluding, I want to mention the three plans. First there is the plan that I have suggested, about the issuance of this currency, which would be backed by gold, and a sinking fund for its retirement if you should desire to retire it, but I do not believe that you will ever desire to retire it once it is put into circulation, because it will be money that the people can use upon which no one will be paying interest. Other people say that we should get it from the Federal reserve system. On that money, interest must be paid.

In order to build up this sinking fund for the purpose of retiring this money, we would use the same sinking fund that is now being built up to retire the certificates in 1945, and I suggest for the consideration of the committee that the payments that are due on the war debts be considered as one way of building up this reserve. That is about twice as large each year as is necessary to build up this reserve to retire these certificates in 1945, and, of course, the money, if it is issued now, would not be fiat money, no more fiat money than any other paper money that you have. No person has a right to call that fiat money unless he calls all paper money fiat money. I know it is a term that carries a great deal of force and prejudice along with it, but it is not fiat money.

The second plan is the Owen plan, of Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, and the other day he conferred with a large group of Members of Congress—I presume that there were about 30 Members there, those that we could assemble quickly who were interested in this cause, and Senator Owen suggested that although he is favorable to my plan and that, as he said, it would be a godsend to the Nation, yet, if those who are the most conservative ones object to it because it is a direct issue from the Treasury of the United States, he had a plan to suggest for the consideration of the committee.

Now, let me state that I think that because this money is issued directly by the Treasury is another reason, an added reason, why it should be done that way. If it is issued that way, it can not be taken out quickly. The Federal reserve banks, if they issue this money, can take it out just as quickly as they issued it.

Mr. HILL. You mean that they can draw it in, and cancel it?

Mr. PATMAN. Absolutely; they can withdraw it and cancel it, and now they have their expanding in order to meet the argument we are making. They have confessed that they have been wrong for many months because they have failed to expand the currency when it was within their power to expand it, but who knows that as soon as this Congress adjourns or as soon as the election is over that they will not withdraw that currency and destroy it as rapidly as they put it out into the country?

Under my plan they could not do it; it would be outside of the scope of their authority to do it.

The Owen plan is that bonds shall be issued, say, 3½ or 4 per cent bonds, and that these bonds are not to be interest bearing immediately. The Government would not pay any interest on them, but they would take these bonds and place them in the Federal reserve banks to the credit of the Federal reserve agents of those banks. The Federal reserve agents, as agents of the United States Government, would hold these bonds as security for the currency issued through the Federal reserve system to pay off these adjusted-service certificates, holding the bonds in lieu of the certificates, and then Senator Owen said that if you desired to put stabilization in this bill, to make sure that the prices do not go too high—and I do not think it is necessary—but if you want to consider it, you can put a clause in there that in the event commodity prices rise above the level, say, of 1926, using 1926 as 100, and you desire to retire some of that currency, you can permit the Federal reserve agent to sell off enough of these bonds and withdraw a sufficient amount of currency in order to stabilize the price level; and until the price level gets to the level of 1926, you would not have to pay one penny of interest on those bonds, and I believe that all of you gentlemen will admit that you would be mighty glad to pay interest on several times the amount of the bonds if you could only restore this country to the 1926 price level.

Now, the Thomas plan is next.

Mr. HILL. Before you get to that, who owns these bonds when they are placed with the Federal reserve agents?

Mr. PATMAN. They will be the property of the United States Government, placed in the hands of the Federal reserve agents to hold, to secure the issuance of these Federal reserve notes.

Mr. HILL. And they will be interest bearing so long as they are so held?

Mr. PATMAN. They will not be interest bearing so long as they are so held, except as a matter of bookkeeping, until they are sold, and they will not be sold until the price level goes back over a certain level.

Mr. HILL. And the only purpose of placing them on sale would be to reduce the circulating currency by the amount of the bonds sold?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. And, after they are sold——

Mr. PATMAN. They would become interest bearing, but not before; but I think all of us will admit that we would be mighty glad to pay interest on those bonds.

Mr. HILL. What rate of interest have you in mind?

Mr. PATMAN. Senator Owen suggested 3½ per cent or 4 per cent. I do not make that statement. I know that even those connected with the Federal reserve system will tell you that 3½ per cent would be a reasonable rate to put there.

Now, the next plan is the Thomas plan. Senator Thomas's plan is just to issue the bonds and to turn them over to the Federal reserve system and let the Federal reserve system issue immediately that amount of Federal reserve notes which will circulate as currency to pay off the adjusted-service certificates. Under his plan, there would be an interest charge immediately, and it would continue. Of course, he says that only 2 per cent interest would be charged, but I do not know whether that would be agreed upon or not. But there is some doubt as to the constitutionality of that. Of course, I want the committee to pass upon it and give it careful consideration, and with that thought in view, I invited Senator THOMAS to come over here, and we gave him all the time he wanted and we also gave his witnesses all the time he wanted.

But I believe that the plan suggested either by myself, which is not original with me—others have advanced it for years and years as far back as 50 or 100 years ago—and I desire no credit for it and am not asking for any credit, but I believe that that plan or the Owen plan would be preferable to the Thomas plan.

Mr. CRISP. Are there any questions?

Mr. RAGON. The information I wanted I suppose I can better get from General Hines. He will be called later.

Mr. VINSON. In regard to the sinking fund, what use would you make of it?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, there is no disposition made of the sinking fund under my bill, and the sinking fund would continue as in the past and then this money could be used each year, $112,000,000, or set aside; you could either leave it there, or build up the sinking fund as now, or you could use that money, but under my bill the sinking fund would be continued as it is now.

Mr. VINSON. Does your bill provide the use to which the sinking fund would be put?

Mr. PATMAN. No; it does not, because it is a good many years until 1945, and I believe that by that time this money will be a part of our permanent circulating medium and you will use that three and a half billion dollars for something else.

Mr. VINSON. Does your bill deal with the sinking fund?

Mr. PATMAN. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. CRISP. I am under the impression that the principal and interest collected under the Owen bill are pledged or impounded under the law to go to the retirement of the national debt of the United States, and the interest on the money loaned to the foreign governments at the time the loans were made, when we were in the war. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PATMAN. I am not sure. I am not informed.

Mr. CRISP. I think that is correct. I won't make it as a positive statement.

Mr. PATMAN. Anyway, that could easily be changed, and I think it would be more incentive for those countries to pay that up.

Mr. CRISP. But if we had pledged that before the bonds were sold, could Congress change that? Would that be keeping faith with the present holders?

Mr. PATMAN. As much as granting a moratorium without the consent of the bondholders.

Mr. CRISP. I think, as to the moratorium, that if we had not granted it, we could not have collected.

Mr. MCCORMACK. I do not think it is part of any contract we made with the people of the United States when we sold the Liberty bonds, because the agreements with respect to the payments were not made until several years thereafter.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that, unless I am mistaken, some of those original bonds have been called in and new bonds issued to take their place after the war.

Mr. HAWLEY. My memory is that the law provided that when we made the loans to the foreign countries we should take their securities under the same terms and conditions as those we issued to the people to obtain the funds with which to make the loans.

Mr. CRISP. Same interest and same maturities. We were simply to loan them the benefit of our credit for the purpose of financing them, to keep their armies in the field and to keep from sending more American soldiers abroad.

Mr. PATMAN. The Debt Funding Commission, however, and I believe the chairman will agree with me, changed that contract, and Congress ratified the change.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that that has any bearing here, but I was a member of the Debt Funding Commission, which was confronted with the proposition of trying to salvage as much of the money already loaned as possible. They would not pay it, and there are only two ways to collect an international payment, by voluntary payment or by war, and we were trying to save as much of that as had already been loaned during the war to keep their armies in the field.

Mr. PATMAN. I was merely suggesting, in answer to the question by the chairman, that we have a right to issue this money for that purpose. If we had a right to make a novation of the contract at one time, I presume that we would have a right to change it.

Mr. CRISP. Of course, the change we made was as to how much the foreign governments were to pay us. The question of any obligation to our people who bought the bonds to furnish the money was not, in my view, involved in that case.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, Sergeant York was to be here last week. He is on a speaking tour, and Mr. Ray, the legislative representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, received a letter expressing regret that he could not be here, but he wants to be here at the earliest possible date, and Mr. Ray tells me this morning that Sergeant York said that he can get here by Thursday if we still want him to come, and we would like to have him come for a short statement and we would like to reserve the right to use him between witnesses at that time, if the chairman will give us permission.

Mr. CRISP. I will try to see that he is given an opportunity.

Mr. HILL. May I ask you one more question before you conclude?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Assuming that the plan offered by Senator Owen should be adopted for the payment of the balance of the bonus money, in what way would the Federal reserve system be compensated for handling the transaction?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, the Federal reserve system would not receive any compensation, and I do not think it is in a position to ask too much from the Government in the way of compensation on this, since the Government is helping out the Federal reserve system so much in other ways. You know that the credit of the Nation is behind all the notes issued by the Federal reserve system, and since the Federal reserve system has been permitted to borrow on the credit of this Nation for so many years, and now even the banks have borrowed on that credit, I think the banks certainly would not object to reciprocating.

Mr. HILL. I just wanted to find out whether there was to be any compensation. Ordinarily we understand that these banking institutions do not contribute their services.

Mr. PATMAN. No; but this is a semi-Government institution, I would think, and although the Government does not own a dime of the stock in the Federal reserve banks, as I understand the law the Government can take over those banks any time at all and issue stock to the people who have investments in them if it is necessary to take over the banks to accomplish good results and to promote the general welfare, if they refuse to expand the currency when it should be expanded, or when they contract it when it should not be contracted. I do not think it would be out of place for the committee to consider that.

Mr. VINSON. Referring again to the sinking fund, some reference has been made to the general sinking fund. As I understood your remarks, you suggested that you could take that portion of the sinking fund relating to adjusted-service certificates between now and 1945 to back up the issue of this money.

Mr. PATMAN. That is right, and it will be backed by better than any paper currency in existence to-day except the gold certificates, because the entire paper money is backed up by a sinking fund.

If no other member of the committee desires to ask me any questions, I again want to thank the chairman and each and every member of the committee for the careful consideration which you have given this matter, and we desire to close our case at this time, with the understanding, of course, that we will be allowed time in rebuttal after the other side has been presented.

Mr. CRISP. We thank you and your witnesses for the information given us and for your opinions, and, as I told you, you will be given an opportunity to put on witnesses in rebuttal if you desire to do so.

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1932.

FURTHER STATEMENT OF HON. WRIGHT PATMAN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, we expect to close this morning, if it is possible to do so.

C. F. Childs & Co., 120 Broadway, New York, N. Y., issued a bulletin in April, 1931, in which the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, were criticized for their statements before the Senate committee in opposition to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

The statement is significant for this reason: The same erroneous statements are now being made before this committee for the purpose of misleading the country as to what will be the results on our economic situation if the legislation is passed to pay the adjusted-service certificates.

I do not care to insert the whole statement, but I would like to insert just the short part that refers to the misleading statements.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. You have identified that by date of publication?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; and I have the publication before me. It says:

"Undignified, misleading statements characterized much of the testimony directed to the congressional committee for the purpose of dissuading Congress from authorizing a bonus payment and a bond issue. Congress was erroneously informed that the issuance of additional Government securities would necessitate paying a high interest rate, cause bank failures, portfolio losses, and demoralization of the Government-bond market. Holders previously content with long-term bonds recognized the possibility of a shrinkage in their market value."

The United States owns about four and three-tenths billions of gold; France owns three and two-tenths billions of gold. In other words, the United States and France own $45 per capita of the gold of the entire world, and for the rest of the world there is only $2.25 of gold per capita. That is for the rest of the entire world outside of France and the United States.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. ESLICK. You have probably kept in closer touch with this situation than anyone else. From the information you have before you, what percentage of the veterans desire this payment?

Mr. PATMAN. I believe it can truthfully be said that 98 per cent desire it. I think that can truthfully be said—that 98 per cent of the veterans of the World War desire this payment.

I have here excerpts from a document printed March 14, 1919, by the war-loan organizations of the different Federal reserve districts. That was when they were putting over the fifth Victory loan drive, and these statements made in those official publications, I think, are interesting, and will have a direct bearing on this legislation. One statement is made here that the war was costing $2,000,000,000 every month, and it went ahead to show that by reason of these war contractors furnishing the material and the supplies and everything it enabled the war to be more quickly terminated and saved $2,000,000,000 a month, and therefore they should not hesitate in raising the money to pay off all the bills of the war.

I desire to insert in the record an article entitled "Why Germany Quit." It is in a publication known as the Liberty Bell, published on March 14, 1919, by the war-loan organization of the ninth Federal reserve district, 418 First National-Soo Building, Minneapolis, Minn.

It is as follows:

"WHY GERMANY QUIT

"Germany tested the metal of America's fighting men. Germany knew just what America was doing in preparation at home. Germany quit. Why? Because America's tremendous show of spirit and power convinced the Boche that it was only a question of time. This country's fighters 'over there' and the makers 'over here' ended the war at least six months before the best-qualified experts believed it possibly could be ended. As a result, there were saved 100,000 Americans whose sacrifice would have cast shadows on just that many additional American homes. Is that unshed blood worth the cost of unused munitions and unfilled contracts?

"Six months more of war would have meant $12,000,000,000 more expense, and instead of facing the last Liberty loan and one year of saving and buying of thrift stamps, the people of America would be facing the fifth loan, with the sixth and seventh and many years of sacrifice in prospect.

"Was what may seem to us immense expenditures and colossal contracts justified to save $12,000,000,000? Remember, these things all had to be done immediately, and on that account there were some unavoidable waste and some needless expenditures. But because they were done immediately the war ended suddenly. Was it worth the price? Is America going to quibble about expenditures or is it going to set about finishing the job with gratefulness and joy?

"The money that was spent scaring Germany to death is the money we must raise by selling Government securities in 1919."

Other excerpts from the same publication, which had for its purpose putting over the fifth Victory loan, are as follows:

"The war was a job 'wished' on us by the Boche, but it was our job. The fighting part of the job is done. Our honored dead and our victorious returning troops are evidence of the thoroughness with which that part of the job was done.

"Now, in order that our heroes 'may not have died in vain,' we must finish the job, pay our debts.

"Shall we hesitate to pay the bills? No! We will thank God and buy to our utmost.

"After a successful operation, you can't refuse to pay the doctor.

"People say it is going to be a hard job to make the American people do their duty, now that the guns, the shouting, and the tumult have subsided. It's a lie."

Mr. PATMAN. This statement shows that, although our Nation owes $17,500,000,000, it also owns securities of the value of $12,672,256,713.21; and if we collect the amount that is due on those securities, our national debt is less than $5,000,000,000—rather small considering a $400,000,000,000 Nation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are the foreign debts included in that?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir; they are. The foreign debts represent about eleven billion. The other one and one-half billions are represented by stocks in different corporations and bonds and stocks of railroad companies.

Mr. HAWLEY. Taken over during the time we had the Railroad Administration?

Mr. PATMAN. Some of them were. Most of them were, Mr. HAWLEY.

I have here, I believe, some interesting information in the form of a letter from Mr. A. A. Ballantine, Under Secretary of the Treasury. At my request he has prepared a statement showing the amount of paper money that was issued by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing from July 1, 1931, to March 31, 1932. It shows the amount that was redeemed, and it also shows the amount of the several kinds of old-sized currency that were outstanding February 29, 1932.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it may go in the record.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 6, 1932.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In compliance with your telephone request to the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, I am pleased to furnish the following information regarding the paper currency of the United States.

The total amount of each kind of currency issued and redeemed between July 1, 1931, and March 31, 1932, follows, except that the amounts of Federal reserve notes and Federal reserve bank notes issued and redeemed are shown to February 29, 1932, figures for March not yet being available:

	Total issued	Total redeemed
From July 1, 1931, to Mar. 31, 1932:
United States notes	$231,448,000	$231,448,000
Silver certificates	434,240,000	435,122,250
Gold certificates	297,000,000	261,302,750
Treasury notes of 1890		11,850
National-bank notes	299,996,520	265,912,373
From July 1, 1931, to Feb. 29, 1932:
Federal reserve notes	2,911,145,500	2,100,981,270
Federal reserve bank notes		143,822

The following amounts of the several kinds of old-sized currency were outstanding on February 29, 1932:

United States notes	$42,994,772
Silver certificates	46,847,150
Gold certificates	158,216,519
National-bank notes	85,388,466
Federal reserve notes	224,989,240
Federal reserve bank notes	2,830,140
Treasury notes of 1890	1,227,900
Total	562,494,187

The reduction in size did not affect two issues: Treasury notes of 1890 and Federal reserve bank notes.

The issue of Treasury notes of 1890 has been in process of retirement since 1900. On receipt in the Treasury they are canceled and retired, and silver certificates issued in lieu thereof. Federal reserve bank notes (which may be issued to Federal reserve banks under the same terms and conditions as national-bank notes are issued to national banks, except that the amount issuable is not limited to the paid-in capital of the issuing bank) also are in process of retirement, and the amount outstanding has been covered by the deposit of lawful money in the Treasury. The notes are being canceled and retired as received.

Very truly yours,

A. A. BALLANTINE,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PATMAN. I believe it has been in evidence here that there is $562,494,187 of old-sized currency that has never been turned in. Of course, a large part of that has been lost in fires and shipwrecks and in other ways.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Patman, have you the figure there showing the difference between these two amounts resulting from the currency that was printed during the month of February? What is the net gain, if any?

Mr. PATMAN. As to the net gain, take, for instance, the Federal reserve notes. They issued $2,900,000,000. Two billion one hundred million of that was used to redeem old notes that were turned in. That meant an additional issue of $800,000,000.

Of United States notes they issued just the same amount that was redeemed; silver certificates, practically the same. Of gold certificates they issued $297,000,000, and there was only $261,000,000 redeemed. In national-bank notes there was $299,000,000 issued, and $265,000,000 of that was redeemed.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask you, Mr. Patman, in connection with that letter from Mr. Ballantine, to repeat the amounts of old currency?

Mr. PATMAN. I should be glad to do that.

The following amounts of the several kinds of old-sized currency were outstanding on February 29, 1932:

United States notes, $42,000,000—

Do you want the exact figures?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; just roughly.

Mr. PATMAN. United States notes, $42,000,000; silver certificates, $46,000,000; gold certificates, $158,000,000; national-bank notes, $85,000,000; Federal reserve notes, $224,000,000; Federal reserve bank notes, $2,000,000; Treasury notes of 1890, $1,000,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is everything outstanding; but I thought you referred to quite a large quantity that they knew had been lost by fire, shipwrecks, and so forth. Is there any estimate of that amount?

Mr. PATMAN. That was a conclusion of my own.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Ballantine does not refer to that?

Mr. PATMAN. No, sir; he does not refer to that. You know, I stated that this old-sized currency is outstanding, and the fact that it has not been brought in——

Mr. TREADWAY (interposing). You mean by "old-sized currency" the currency that we had before we adopted the present smaller bill?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY. That was only about three years ago, was it not; three or four years?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir; about three or four years.

Mr. TREADWAY. What I was leading up to was this interesting feature. It may be only a side light on your testimony, but it would be quite interesting to me to see whether the Treasury has made any allowance for the certainty of destruction of a certain percentage of this outstanding currency.

Mr. PATMAN. It has not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Some of this goes away back indefinitely, over a long period of years, probably?

Mr. PATMAN. Thirty or forty years or more.

Take these Treasury notes of 1890, with $1,227,000 outstanding. Of course, they are being retired as rapidly as they come in, and have been for many years.

Mr. TREADWAY. The department does not make any reference, then, to any percentage that they feel has been destroyed and can not ever be redeemed?

Mr. PATMAN. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. VINSON. Doctor Goldenweiser yesterday gave it as a hundred million dollars.

Mr. PATMAN. As I understand, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Rainey, has in mind introducing a bill, or has introduced one, to provide that they will have to turn this money in at a certain time, or something along that line.

Mr. RAINEY. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. PATMAN. Then I have been misinformed. Anyway that would be a good proposal—to pass some kind of a law that would encourage people not to invalidate the money if it was not turned in, but to encourage people to turn it in—in order that you may determine how much of it has been lost, so that that idle gold that is being used to back that money could be used to back other money.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. PATMAN, if they turned that in, that amount of gold would go out.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir; if they turned it in and demanded gold. But, of course, less than one-eighth of 1 per cent of the people do that.

Mr. VINSON. They would turn it in, and the banks, if they want the currency, would be willing to take any currency that was on a parity with it. They could take Federal reserve notes at 60 per cent.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr RAINEY. What Mr. PATMAN refers to is this: We have a lot of currency that has evidently been destroyed, and it is still backed by gold, although it is nonexistent, and Mr. PATMAN's suggestion is that we might determine how much that is, so that the gold which is supposed to be represented by currency outstanding can be represented by currency actually issued in lieu of the currency which has in fact been destroyed.

Mr. VINSON. I endeavored to bring that out when Governor Meyer was on the stand last week.

Mr. RAINEY. I have not introduced a bill of that kind, but I think it ought to be done.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; and I hope the gentleman will do it.

I desire to quote Prof. Irving Fisher's testimony, which is printed in part 1 of the hearings on H. R. 10517. The hearings were before a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives on a bill for increasing and stabilizing the price level of commodities, and other purposes. Professor Fisher, on page 346 of the hearings, stated:

"The present depression is for the most part due, I would say nine-tenths due, to deflation."

On page 347, he further said:

"I heard one of the leading bankers—I wish I had permission to quote him, but I do not want to do anything I am not authorized to do—the president of one of the largest banks in one of our largest cities, and the chairman of one of the most important committees of the American Bankers Association, say that we must raise the price level to let people pay their debts, and that if we do not he fears that the whole capitalistic system is going to collapse. He was willing to raise the price level by changing the weight of the dollar."

Now, may I state here that I do not see how any Member of Congress can vote for the Goldsborough bill and then consistently vote against this plan which we now have before this committee, or some similar plan to put money in circulation to cause commodity prices to increase. It would be inconsistent otherwise. What is the Goldsborough bill? To raise commodity prices and then stabilize them. Every witness who appeared before the Goldsborough committee—and I heard every one of them, and I have read their testimony again since they appeared—every one of them stated that the first thing you have got to do is to put money into circulation and raise the price level, and then under this bill it can be stabilized, but it is not right to stabilize it on present values. It will put people into bankruptcy and cause repudiation of debts. Therefore this plan that we propose should be passed in order to make effective the Goldsborough bill, and if this plan is not passed, some plan that will have that effect should be passed.

On page 369 Professor Fisher outlined several ways that the currency could be deflated. He stated:

"We need first to raise the price level enough to let debtors pay their creditors on as just a basis to both as practicable; and, secondly, thereafter to stabilize the price level.

"The raising of the price level must be done either (a) by increasing the circulating medium, or (b) by increasing its activity or velocity, which means, in particular, reducing hoarding.

"The circulating medium may be increased in many ways— "

Now, I hope you gentlemen will pay particular attention to this quotation from Professor Fisher:

"1. The United States may issue new United States notes in purchase of United States bonds, or in purchase of silver or anything else, or paying its employees."

Now, that is exactly the proposal that is before this committee to-day. Of course, Professor Fisher did not say that here. He was not asked the question. If he had been, I am sure he would have said it. But he said what I have just quoted before the Goldsborough committee—in other words, that this plan that we now present to the committee is a sound plan because it is like the plan he presented to the Goldsborough committee.

Quoting further from Professor Fisher:

"2. The Federal reserve may buy United States bonds or other securities permitted, paying for them by Federal reserve notes or book credits.

"3. National banks could be given the bank note privilege as to the one and a half billion dollars' worth of United States bonds issued in 1931."

Now, that case is very similar to the one that we have now. We want to convert a noncirculating Government obligation into a circulating obligation. That is all we are trying to do. Professor Fisher advocated the same thing before the Goldsborough committee. He says it is safe to do it—to convert one and one-half billion dollars' worth of noncirculating Government obligations into that amount of circulating notes.

On page 370, Professor Fisher further stated:

"A penalty might be imposed upon banks not in debt to the Federal reserve banks at least once a year. This, or some other device, might be able to break up the tradition that it is a reflection upon a bank to be in debt to the Federal reserve bank.

"Put an embargo on gold as during the war. This would enable us to issue the irredeemable money to a large extent without destroying gold parity, so that we would, in form, retain the gold standard. If desired, limitations or prohibitions could be put upon the melting or industrial uses of gold, as also was done during the war. This measure, however, while it might help America, would tend to hurt rather than help other countries, and indirectly react somewhat unfavorably upon America herself."

In asking for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates in full now, we are merely asking for the $1 and $1.25 a day as of the time the services were rendered with a reasonable rate of interest from that time to October 1, 1931, the amount due being the face value of the certificates.

The Ways and Means Committee recently submitted to the House a tax bill. In section 1003 of this bill, titled "Refund of Taxes for Taxable Year 1918," amended section 284 (H) of the revenue act of 1926, the statute of limitation was removed from cases of tax refunds for the year 1918 where applications for said refunds were not filed within the time required by law. The only case that this will likely govern that I have been able to find out about is a case of the Phillips Mine & Mill Supply Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., involving $49,421.28. If this provision becomes a law, and it was in the bill when it passed the House, this concern will be able to collect not only the $49,421.28 but also 6 per cent interest from 1918, the time it is alleged the overpayment was made. We are asking that the same principle be invoked for the veterans. That is asking that the payment be made as of the time the services were rendered.

In this case, although the amount is small, billions have been refunded by invoking the same principle of paying interest from the time that the overpayment was made or from the time that the services were rendered.

Mr. HILL. Your statement is that the payment of the basic amount of the adjusted-service certificates plus a reasonable rate of interest to October 1 last would amount to the face value of the certificates?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. That is, at the maturity date of the certificates?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is that an exact figure, or is it approximate?

Mr. PATMAN. It is an exact figure; and I have a table here which I will ask to be inserted in the record, with explanatory notes, which shows it conclusively, on the average certificate.

May I do that, Mr. Chairman?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Yes.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

"John Doe was a private soldier during the war. He holds an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000, which is the average; it is dated January 1, 1925, and the $1,000 is payable at death or January 1, 1945. Doe claims the Government owes him $1,000 for adjusted pay at this time and he should therefore not be required to die or wait until 1945 before it is collected. Congress passed a law in 1924 acknowledging that all veterans of the World War were entitled to $1 a day extra pay for home service and $1.25 a day extra for service overseas. Doe was entitled to the following:

210 days' home service, at $1 a day extra	$210
200 days' service overseas, at $1.25 a day	250

"The question is, When was the money due? If it is paid as of 1925, that would be equal to a payment of about 60 or 70 cents as of the time the services were rendered in 1917 and 1918. If the money is paid as of the time the services were rendered and a reasonable interest is calculated from a date representing halfway between the beginning and ending of the emergency period during the war, or June 1, 1918, Doe was entitled to the full $1,000 on October 1, 1931. How much interest should Doe be allowed? For many years the Government caused Doe to pay 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for his own money. Therefore, the Government should invoke the same principle for Doe that it has always invoked for others under similar circumstances and pay him at least 6 per cent, compounded annually. The following table represents what he is entitled to.

Table to show the amount of $460 at 6 per cent compounded annually from June 1, 1918, to June 1, 1932, and also the amount as at October 1, 1931

	Interest	Total amount
June 1—
1918		$460.00
1919	$27.60	487.60
1920	29.25	516.85
1921	31.01	547.86
1922	32.87	580.73
1923	34.84	615.57
1924	36.93	652.50
1925	39.15	691.65
1926	41.49	733.14
1927	43.98	777.12
1928	46.62	823.74
1929	49.42	873.16
1930	52.38	925.54
1931	55.53	981.07
1932	58.86	1,039.93

NOTE.—The amount at Oct. 1, 1931, would be $1,000.69.

"Instead of Doe receiving the $460 as of the time the services were rendered, he was given an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000. When Doe was discharged he was given $60 for the purpose of purchasing a civilian suit of clothes, he having given his civilian suit to the Red Cross to be sent to Belgium and France to relieve distress there at the time of his entry into the service. This left $400. Congress declared that he should have 25 per cent added to his credit for waiting until January 1, 1945, for his money. This increased his credit by $100, or to $500. Five hundred dollars was a sufficient amount to pay a single premium on $1,000 insurance policy similar to his adjusted-service certificate, and instead of the cash settlement he was given the $1,000 certificate.

"WHAT CHANGES ARE TO BE MADE FOR DOE'S BENEFIT

"Doe in asking for full payment is merely asking that his certificate be dated back to the time the services were rendered, the interest rate computed as above mentioned, the $60 not to be deducted, and the $100 credit for waiting be eliminated.

"WHY THE $60 SHOULD NOT HAVE BEEN DEDUCTED

"The $60 payment at discharge was given to the soldier who had served only one day and to the general who was drawing $8,000 a year. Neither the 1-day soldier nor the $8,000-a-year general has been required to pay the $60 back to the Government, so why make those who served longer than 60 days pay it back?

"SHOULD THE $100 OR 25 PER CENT FOR WAITING BE COLLECTED?

"Although the veterans have waited 14 years for their money and the Congress has declared that 25 per cent extra should be added for waiting 20 years, the extra amount is not being asked but is eliminated in arriving at the amount due.

"THE CERTIFICATE SHOULD BE DATED JUNE 1, 1918

"If the certificate is dated June 1, 1918, which is a date halfway between the beginning and ending of the emergency period, or November 11, 1918, the date of the armistice, Doe is entitled to the full $1,000 at this time. It is not right to commence the computation of interest seven and one-half years after the services were rendered, or January 1, 1925.

"THE WAR PROFITEERS RECEIVED INTEREST FROM 1918

"The corporations that profited so much by reason of this country's misery and misfortune during the war received huge settlements for their war services many years after the war was over, and in the form of adjusted pay. Hundreds of millions and billions of dollars were returned to them by the Government. A large part of this money was refunded or given back to them on the theory that the taxpayers did not charge off a sufficient amount for depreciation of their war facilities from 1917–1919.

"The United States Steel Corporation, the concern that made a profit of $1,500,000 a day during the war, received a refund of $15,736,595.72 for the year 1918. The refund was made about 11 years after the war, and interest at 6 per cent was paid by the Government on this refund. The interest amounted to $10,099,765. The Government allowed the 6 per cent interest on the theory that the taxpayer would have been charged 6 per cent interest on any amount assessed and collected that should have been paid but was not paid in 1918. That is the same principle we are invoking for the veterans. They were charged 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for their own money; therefore the Government should not object to paying them the minimum rate of 6 per cent, compounded annually. The Aluminum Co. of America submitted a claim for amortization of war facilities in 1919 for $6,852,697.36. December 1, 1921, or a few months after Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, the principal owner of this company, became Secretary of the Treasury, a supplemental claim was filed for $18,124,339.28. The amount finally granted was $15,589,614.39. Interest on the amount refunded was allowed at the rate of 6 per cent from the year 1918—not from January 1, 1925. We are asking that the same principle be invoked for John Doe.

"THE AMOUNT OF MONEY VETERANS IN EACH COUNTY WILL RECEIVE

"February 18, 1932, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement showing how much money the veterans in each county in the United States will receive if the bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates becomes law. It will be found on pages 4289 to 4299 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the above date.

"HOW MUCH WILL EACH STATE RECEIVE AND HOW MUCH WILL IT COST THE TAXPAYERS OF EACH STATE?

"The following table in connection with the footnotes is self-explanatory:

(1) Residence of veterans	(2) Number holders certificates	(3) Remainder due on certificates	(4) Amount each State will contribute income taxes	(5) 98.66 per cent class taxpayers	(6) 50 per cent class taxpayers	(7) Per capita payment to each State
Alabama	49,391	$29,876,840	$7,879,584	2,103	13	$12.00

Column 1. Residence by States of all veterans holding adjusted-service certificates.

Column 2. Number of veterans in each State holding certificates.

Column 3. After deducting all prior loans, the amount remaining due veterans of each State if full-payment bill is passed by Congress.

Column 4. Total amount income-tax payers in each State will eventually contribute toward full payment if the money is raised through individual income taxes. Year 1928 used as a basis.

Column 5. Secretary Mellon, in his plea for a sales tax, disclosed that 380,000 persons in the United States pay 97 per cent of all individual income taxes. Investigation discloses that 382,121 persons pay 98.66 per cent of the total tax paid by individuals. This column shows the number of persons from each State in the class that pays 98.66 per cent.

Column 6. Residence of personal income-tax payers who have an annual income in excess of $150,000 and are in the class paying 50 per cent of the total individual income taxes.

Column 7. Full payment will average per person, or for every man, woman, and child in the State, according to the 1930 census. The approximate amount of money that will be put into circulation in any city, county, or locality may be arrived at by multiplying the population by the per capita payment for that State

"The information for columns 1, 2, and 3 of this table was compiled from information furnished by the Veterans' Administration. The other information was obtained from the statistical division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and other governmental sources."

Mr. HILL. Is it not rather a coincidence that it will amount to the same as the original certificate?

Mr. PATMAN. It will amount to more now; but it amounted to $1,000.69 on the average certificate of a thousand dollars on October 1, 1931.

Mr. HILL. What interest do you figure?

Mr. PATMAN. Six per cent.

Mr. HILL. And from what date?

Mr. PATMAN. From halfway between the beginning and the ending of the average man's service, which was June 1, 1918.

Mr. ESLICK. In the erroneous payment of taxes, both for and against the Government, the 6 per cent rate is uniform?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir. If they pay too little, they must pay 6 per cent on what they should have paid. If they pay too much, they get 6 per cent on what they overpay.

Mr. ESLICK. That is a uniform rate?

Mr. PATMAN. And let me suggest that when the war was over many of these concerns, for two or three years thereafter, would go back to the Government and say, "We did not file an application for a sufficient amount for depreciation of our war facilities during the war," and would file a new application and get a new allowance for depreciation of war facilities. That involved hundreds of millions of dollars, and the Government invoked this same policy and the same principle that we are asking you to invoke here, of paying them not from the time that the claim was finally adjudicated, which was in many cases 10 years later, but from the time they claim they should have made their application in 1918.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Patman, was not that a reciprocal arrangement? The Government had the same privilege of reassessing them that they had of receiving an additional application?

Mr. PATMAN. Absolutely true; and we want the same principle invoked.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the Government gained about $2,000,000,000 in money by that action?

Mr. PATMAN. That is the first time I have ever heard that, Mr. Hawley. I would like to have that information. I did not know that they ever assessed one of them, and I thought I had read everything in that connection. I have in my office to-day a copy of the hearings before the Graham committee and a copy of the hearings before the Couzens committee. I think I have read every word that is material on this question in those books—and I suspect there are 40 or 50 of them—but I have never heard that suggested before to-day. I am of the opinion that you must be mistaken, but I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. VINSON. When you speak of the interest rate, that is 6 per cent simple interest?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VINSON. Not compound?

Mr. PATMAN. But here, you see, the veterans were charged 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest compounded annually for their money from 1927 until the interest rate was changed; and our theory of it is that if it is fair for the veterans to pay 6 per cent compounded annually, it is not unfair for the Government to allow the veteran 6 per cent compounded annually. That is the same principle that was invoked with the others.

Mr. RAGON. If they expired in October, 1931, it would have to be 6 per cent?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, it would. If one is charged 6 per cent compound interest he should get 6 per cent compound interest; if he is charged 6 per cent simple interest he should get only 6 per cent simple interest.

Mr. VINSON. In regard to the refunds, the interest rate on refunds is simple?

Mr. PATMAN. It is simple because, if they had not paid enough, they would have just paid simple interest.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Patman, in reference to your 6, 7, and 8 per cent, is it not true that that was by reason of the Federal reserve in various districts having a different rate of interest?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. BACHARACH. I just wanted to get that into the record.

Mr. PATMAN. But Congress, by law, required the payment of 2 per cent above the rediscount rate in the district in which the veteran resided. That was to take care of the bankers. They claimed that this bill was objectionable from their standpoint; that it would lower the interest rates, and they wanted to fix it so that they could make a profit out of it. I do not know what Congress had in mind at that time. I know that they did what they thought was best for the interests of the counry.

Mr. BACHARACH. At that time, apparently, the reason it was done was that the Ways and Means Committee thought it was the right and proper thing.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACHARACH. And the fact that we did not think they had the money down here to go ahead and pay these boys.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes, sir. I do not question the committee or any Member of Congress on that.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the $2,000,000,000 amount referred to by Mr. HAWLEY, was he referring to refunds of amounts allowable for depreciation?

Mr. HAWLEY. The additional assessments made as offset by the claims.

Mr. VINSON. But that was not for the mere item of depreciation to which Mr. PATMAN was referring?

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

Mr. PATMAN. I am glad that was corrected. I misunderstood it; because I never heard of their assessing one of those fellows. If there was one of them assessed, I have been unable to find it. Of course the Government paid back hundreds of millions to them.

Mr. HAWLEY. And they made additional assessments over the amounts reported as payable in the returns.

Mr. PATMAN. Not on depreciation, I think.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know about that; but I know that on the whole subject they assessed about five and a quarter billions, and two billions of that was net to the Treasury. Other adjustments were made.

Mr. BACHARACH. That was by reason of the fact that the Government requested manufacturers to build additional facilities for manufacturing.

Mr. HAWLEY. That was one item.

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes; and an important item; and in that case I think the Government should have paid them back and it did pay them back.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; where that was the case, Mr. Bacharach, I thoroughly agree with you.

Mr. HAWLEY. They did not always pay them back. They considered what advantage the new plant was to the concern.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. But there are cases in the record disclosed by the Graham committee where they continued to use those plants and make more money than they made before, and still asked for a large sum in depreciation of those facilities, and actually obtained it.

Mr. HAWLEY. They obtained it in part.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; and the Graham committee thought it was a big scandal, and wound up its report—I do not know why that report has never been given any more publicity than it has—but it wound up its report by saying that people who would so profiteer in time of war should be held guilty of treason, and they even went so far as to suggest how the Constitution should be amended so that in the event of another war, if we had such profiteers as that, they should be punished by death for treason against their country. It was very shocking to that committee. There were 15 Republicans and 10 Democrats on that committee.

Let us not forget that the wealth of our Nation is $400,000,000,000; that our Nation only owes $17,500,000,000; that our Nation owns assets in the form of securities aggregating $12,500,000,000. After deducting the securities held and owned by the Government from our national debt, our national debt is only about $5,000,000,000. As disclosed in my testimony the first day of this hearing from information furnished by Doctor Warren and Doctor Pierson, the total debts in the United States, including national,

State, county, city, corporation, private installment purchases, and all other debts, aggregate $200,000,000,000. We propose the issuance of $2,000,000,000 in new currency, which is only 1 per cent of the debts of the people of our Nation.

It has been contended before this committee that the 25 per cent increase which was added to the adjusted-service credit was to compensate the veterans for the loss of interest on their money from the time of rendering the services until January 1, 1925, the date of the first adjusted-service certificate, the theory being that to give a veteran a dollar as of 1925 was equal to only giving him about 60 or 70 cents as of 1917 or 1918, and Congress had clearly expressed an intent to pay each veteran $1 a day extra for home service and $1.25 a day extra for service overseas. It is my opinion that the 25 per cent was not to make up for lost interest as above stated but was intended to compensate the veterans for waiting from 1925 to 1945. As evidence of this fact, the beneficiaries of deceased veterans, who received the adjusted-service credits of these veterans after the passage of the compensation act in 1924, did not receive the 25 per cent increase; neither did the veterans who were entitled to $50 or less and who were paid in cash.

Therefore that is conclusive evidence that the 25 per cent was not intended for waiting that seven and a half years until 1925. In fact, I heard Mr. Mills testify before the Senate committee in February, 1931, and he brought out the two points that I have suggested here as evidence of the fact that it was not intended as interest.

By reason of the investment boom from 1927 to its peak in the fall of 1929, money was drained from all the small banks of the Nation to one or two financial centers. It was invested in securities of different kinds, and a large part of it sent to foreign countries in return for foreign securities. If this bill passes it will put new money back into these banks.

Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, recently appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee. He made the following statement about ex-Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, and Prof. Williford I. King, of New York University:

"Now as to this bill and the present hearings. You have heard already from many men who have anticipated what I would have said, especially ex-Senator Owen and Prof. W. I. King. Ex-Senator Owen omitted to mention that he had introduced into the original Glass bill, now the Federal reserve act, a stabilization clause which was afterwards stricken out. W. I. King, I hope you realize, is one of the leading statisticians and economists of the country. I only wish that those two speeches could have been heard over the radio by every business man and banker in the United States. If they could have been, there would be no doubt about the success of your efforts to get some constructive legislation adopted by Congress immediately. All we need is education. The thing that is needed the most is to have people read what has already been written on this subject. (P. 345, Stabilization of Commodity Prices, H. R. 10517.)"

Mr. PATMAN. Now, we have here a proposal which has recently been drafted. It is not a new proposal. We are not changing our plans. We are merely adding to our plans, in order that the attacks made by the opposition may be completely and fully answered. In preparing this addition we have had the benefit of the counsel and advice of Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, and Mr. Ackerson, of the legislative counsel's office. We have been working on it for several days, and after summing it all up I can read it to you. It is just a few lines.

For the section 2 that I have in H. R. 7726 we propose to insert this in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

"He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

"He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

"These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act.

"In the event that the purchasing power of the dollar in the wholesale commodity markets, as ascertained by the United States Department of Labor, shall at any time fall as much as 2 per cent below the average value of the year 1926, the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as may from time to time be necessary to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the normal standard of 1926.

"Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation."

That, of course, is the plan we have, except that it answers completely the most effective argument that has been made—that it was uncontrolled inflation. Here is a clause that controls it and answers every argument that they have made against this proposal. I want Senator Owen to discuss that, and I shall not discuss this proposal or anything about the money question in relation to this matter. I feel that he is more competent to do it, and I want him to do it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, as I heard it read, that is substantially Senator Owen's proposal.

Mr. PATMAN. Substantially; yes, sir.

Now, the proponents of this measure have been compelled to submit to a lot of abuse and lots of criticism. Of course, we have been accused of being just politicians and asking people to vote this money in order that we may get more votes for ourselves to try to help ourselves out politically. It is a very easy matter to impugn one's motives. I do not impugn the motives of the people who are against us. I would have just as much right to say that all the money is on that side, and that because they are fighting us they are getting money for it. I do not say it; neither do I believe it. But we have as much right to say that they are getting money for their opposition as they have to say that we are asking for votes for our support. But arguments like that should not carry any weight and should not be effective on the mind of any person.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. PATMAN. I want to say that we are honestly and conscientiously trying to save our country. We are trying to do something that will bring our country back. We are trying to use this as a vehicle with which to convey our Nation back to prosperity. If there is another way and a better way by which to put circulating medium into the country that will cause commodity prices to rise—which must be done in order to bring our country back—we would not be unfavorable to it. We would be favorable to it. But after you explore all other methods, I believe, gentlemen, that you will come to this one solution, that this is the only plan that has been offered that will put a definite amount of money in every community in this Nation, according to the number of veterans in that community, which bears a direct and definite ratio to the total population in every community.

I want to thank the committee for their faithful consideration of this bill and the liberal time they have given to its consideration. You have been very patient, very tolerant. I repeat, I have the utmost confidence in this committee. There is no thought in my mind of impugning the motives of any one of the members of the committee.

I want to say in conclusion that Senator Owen will make the concluding argument, and I hope the members of the committee will ask him every question relating to this money proposition about which there is any doubt in your minds. I believe he can successfully answer them.

We are not asking for printing-press money. We are asking for the same kind of circulating medium that is in existence in our Nation to-day.

That is all, gentlemen. Thank you.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. PATMAN, the committee wishes to thank you for your diligent attendance on these hearings and the valuable information you have given the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Strike out section 509 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue from time to time, in addition to all other issues of bonds authorized by law, bonds of the United States in such amounts as he may deem necessary to provide funds for the payment of adjusted-service certificates under the provisions of section 509 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended. Such bonds shall be designated as adjusted-compensation bonds.

"SEC. 2. (a) Such bonds shall be issued in such form or forms and denomination or denominations, and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate or rates of interest, and time or times of payment of interest, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe at or before the time of issuance thereof. The principal and interest shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value. All such bonds shall be exempt both as to principal and interest from taxation by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, to the same extent as bonds issued under the first section of the second Liberty bond act, as amended and supplemented.

"(b) The provisions of the third paragraph of the first section of the second Liberty bond act, as amended and supplemented, shall apply to the bonds issued under the first section of this act.

"SEC. 3. (a) There shall be levied and collected on all nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar nonintoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 3 per cent of alcohol by weight, brewed or manufactured, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a tax at the rate of 3 cents per pint, such article to be bottled at the brewery."

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane; that there is nothing in the proposed bill that provides for the nullification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

There is nothing in the proposed bill before the House that in any way affects the manufacture and sale of beer or intoxicating liquors, and this is an attempt to bring in that question that is not germane. I make the point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that it is not germane for the reason that it provides a method of levying taxes, not provided for or mentioned in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri on the point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I direct attention to the title of the bill H. R. 7726——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The amendment has not been read in full.

Mr. BLANTON. But enough of it has been read to make a point of order against it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It has not been read sufficiently for anyone to determine the question on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if in the opinion of the Chair a sufficient amount has been read to indicate to the Chair that a point of order might lie to that portion read, it is within the province of the Chair to hear the point of order at that point.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I direct attention to the title of the bill H. R. 7726, which is now before the committee. It reads—

A bill to provide for immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

I now direct your attention to the title of my bill which the Committee on Ways and Means reported adversely, the same as the Patman bill. The title of the bill is "To provide for the immediate payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates, and for other purposes."

The purpose of the bill before the committee is to pay the World War adjusted-service certificates. My bill so provides. The gentleman from Texas says his bill was carefully prepared by the Legislative Drafting Service. My bill likewise was carefully prepared by the Legislative Drafting Service.

The difference in the two bills is that the gentleman from Texas seeks to print money to pay the adjusted-service certificates, whereas my bill provides for the issuance of bonds and the levying of a tax of 3 cents per bottle on beer, the money derived from the tax to be used only for retiring the bonds issued to pay the adjusted-service certificates.

That part of the Patman bill in reference to administration is included in my bill. That part of my bill in reference to the issuing of bonds is the same proviso that has been carried in every bill relating to the issuance of bonds that has passed Congress. The provision in reference to the manufacture of beer is the same as carried in the beer bill this House voted on several weeks ago.

My bill is sound. It seeks to provide for the payment of adjusted-service certificates; and that is just exactly what the Patman bill does. It will not disturb the Treasury. It will not cause the value of our outstanding currency to depreciate in value. My bill will not only pay the adjusted-service certificates but it will do more; it will provide jobs for the veterans and others out of employment. Mr. Chairman, I feel the amendment which has for its objective the same purpose as the pending bill is certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The bill pending before the committee is entitled "A bill to provide for the immediate payment of veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates."

After setting out with some particularity in the first section methods of and limitations on payment, it goes on to provide in the second section for the payment of the face value of the certificates.

The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which, among other things, seeks to levy taxes for the purpose of deriving revenue for the payment of these bonds.

In the opinion of the Chair, it is clearly not germane to the fundamental purposes of the bill we have under consideration.

Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we face here to-day a decision of the gravest importance to the security and welfare of our country, an issue that each of us should meet squarely, honestly, and fearlessly, with that same unity of patriotic purpose that characterized our conduct during the World War.

We are at the crucial period of an economic depression without parallel in the history of our country. Our financial structure, the nervous system of the Nation, is partly paralyzed. Private incomes are vastly shrunken, the revenues of the Government seriously impaired, the national credit threatened. The deficit for 1931 was $900,000,000, that for 1932 approximately $3,000,000,000, with the prospective deficit for 1933 some $1,700,000,000. Our whole economic structure is out of equilibrium. Productive industry is prostrate. Millions of our people are in idleness and destitution. Failing immediate relief, social disorders threaten.

For six months we have labored here in the Congress to put into play forces to halt the depression, to arrest deflation, to inspire confidence, and to revive business. We have drastically reduced expenditures, ruthlessly slashed the wages of the Federal employees, separated thousands from the public pay rolls, and laid a heavy burden of taxation upon our people. All this we have done to avoid the unthinkable collapse of our economic system, with its consequent social chaos.

For more than three months we have struggled with a revenue measure, unprecedented in its peace-time burdens, designed to raise $1,118,500,000, which added to the $1,287,000,000 available under existing laws, will balance the Federal Budget and restore national and world confidence in our financial stability and integrity.

Slowly, painfully, and fearfully we have struggled up out of the financial morass. Our feet rest on firmer ground. We hoped again to go forward. But, no! We are confronted here to-day with the proposition that we destroy that constructive work of the session, that we impair even further the stability of our Government, and that we jump back, even deeper into the slough of financial despond from which we have just extricated ourselves.

It is proposed at this time of trial and uncertainty, when all are suffering together, to take this twenty-four hundred million dollars that we are exacting from the small wage-earner, from languishing business, from our overburdened tax payers, and turn it over, not to the hundreds of thousands of men and women standing in the bread lines, wearing the badge of humiliation and failure, not for an equal distribution among all deserving sufferers, but to turn it over to one privileged class, a class to whom the Government is already paying hundreds of millions of dollars each year, and who are faring no worse than the rest of our people.

A just and generous Government gave to these veterans bonus certificates for various amounts, payable in 1945, when through the operation of compound interest, the fund would accumulate and be available for their payment. They are not due now, and to pay them at this time would mean the turning over to the veterans of about twice the amount due. That immense gratuity, if made at this time of national stress and need, must ultimately come from the pockets of the rest of our people by way of taxes, not only a gross injustice to the many, but a very real threat to the financial stability of this Nation.

Payment of the bonus at this time, before it is due, and in about twice the amount due, would mean the wrecking of all the good that we have accomplished. It would mean the inflation of our outstanding currency by 45 per cent and the setting of our feet as a nation in the paths of fiat money, the road to ruin beyond all peradventure.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Payment through an immense bond issue would mean further deflation, the flight of capital from the country, depreciation of Government securities, increased cost in Treasury financing, shrinkage in bank assets, loss to depositors, a general loss of confidence both at home and abroad, and a further deepening of the depression.

Camped about the Capitol to-day, a pitiful sight, are thousands of veterans, patriotic citizens, who do not sense the crisis the Nation they fought to preserve is now facing, who have been led to believe that an unappreciative and forgetful Government is withholding from them their just dues. Did they understand the true situation, these men who fought for American ideals on the fields of France would be the last to endanger those ideals in time of peace.

These men in their hour of trial did their duty and did it well. When the zero hour came they went over the top nor left to others the places of danger and responsibility. We Members of Congress face to-day conditions comparable to those of war, with comparable duties—duties that no one of us may ignore or avoid or delegate to others. This is our zero hour. Let us go over the top for the general welfare of our common country, no matter what the casualties. Better to die politically, conscious of our own self-respect and intellectual honesty [applause], than to preserve a mean political existence through hiding behind others or refusing to listen to the voice of duty whose call a man must answer or lose his soul. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, a great statesman of a century past and gone once said that if war were declared upon our country by an insulting foe we would not wait till our sleeping cities were awakened by the terrible music of a bursting bomb, till our green fields were laid waste and trampled under the hoofs of an invader, or made red by the blood of our brethren. But that we would send forth fleets and armies, we would unloose upon the broad ocean our keen falcons, and the thunder of our guns would arouse stern echoes along the hostile coast.

Our country is at war now. We are at war with depression; we are at war with hunger; we are at war with misery; we are at war with unemployment; we are at war with low prices for agricultural commodities; we are at war with panic. The grim specter of despair is in command of all these forces that are threatening the life of our American institutions as well as the very foundation of our civilization.

Something must be done. Our people can not stand this much longer.

What remedy do our opponents in this fight offer? None. Yet a majority of the Members who are opposing this measure voted for the very laws that have brought us to this frightful condition.

This bill to expand the currency and pay off the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates is the only measure that has been brought before the House that would give our people relief.

If it becomes a law you will see the prices of cotton, wheat, corn, land, and other commodities rise at once, just as they did when we expanded the currency during the World War. It will break this panic overnight.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. NELSON], who is opposing this measure, says that it would expand the currency "45 per cent." What effect would that have? It would bring back prosperity. That is what we want.

From 1914 to 1920 we expanded our currency more than 60 per cent. We raised it from $3,459,000,000 in 1914 to $5,569,000,000 in 1920. And at that time we had nearly $2,000,000,000 less gold than we have to-day. What was the result of that expansion? Cotton went to 30 cents a pound, wheat to $2.25 a bushel. Corn, hogs, land, merchandise, everything advanced, and our people enjoyed an era of prosperity until these financiers got control of our Government and contracted the currency back almost to where it was in 1914 and thereby forced this panic upon us.

Why do you refuse to join us in this fight for relief? Have you more sympathy for the moneyed class, for the people who have their money invested in tax-exempt securities, than you have for the distressed millions of America? Have you more sympathy for a few international bankers than you have for our impoverished farmers who are now selling their crops below the cost of production, for our unemployed laborers who are standing in bread lines or begging the food of charity, or for our penniless veterans who fought the war out of which those financiers made or increased their fortunes?

Look around you and see the evidences of distress. Wheat and cotton are at their lowest price levels for 300 years. How can we pay our debts and taxes with 4-cent cotton and 30-cent wheat—debts we contracted on an inflated currency when prices were high, and that we are now asked to meet by selling our crops at the cheapest prices that have prevailed since America was settled?

Conditions are growing worse. Unemployment is increasing, farm commodity prices are falling, and bread lines are stretching down the streets of every large city in the United States.

Bankruptcies, failures, and foreclosures are multiplying, while the crimson wave of suicide sweeps over the land.

Yet when we appeal to you to pass this measure, the only one that has been proposed that offers the American people speedy and effective relief from this terrible condition, certain men arise in the House, arrogate to themselves a superpatriotism and try to leave the impression that the passage of this measure would be dangerous to American institutions; and intimating, if not asserting, that they are risking their political lives in order "to save the country." I take it for granted that every man within the sound of my voice is as patriotic as I am, and I contend that every man in this House is just as patriotic as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. NELSON] or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. All this talk about your own patriotism is entirely beside the issue.

Besides, if there is a question of patriotism involved, I submit that these veterans have the better of the argument. They have had occasion to show their patriotism in defense of their country. They did not fail us then, and we should not fail them now.

Remember that these ragged veterans who are here in the Capitol to-day are the same men for whom you waved the flag and beat the drum when they were marching away to war 15 years ago. Some newspapers have led the country to believe that these men who have come to Washington are a bunch of "reds." They would have you believe that they are coming here to "threaten Congress." The truth is they are merely a cross section of our American citizenship. They are the most orderly bunch of men that I have ever seen. They are red-blooded American patriots.

And do not you forget that they have behind them the public sentiment of America. I saw that tested last night. They had a great Flag Day parade here in Washington, with floats, bands, soldiers, marines, cavalry, artillery, and all the other implements and garnishments of war. One hundred thousand people looked on silently until there appeared the remnants of this tattered army who are now gathered in Washington, and who are appealing to Congress with outstretched hands to pay them what this Government owes them. When they appeared there was a spontaneous outburst of applause that rang across the plaza and echoed down Pennsylvania Avenue until it died away before the somber silence of the White House. [Applause.]

In this so-called bonus army are many men with congressional medals upon their breasts, men who went over the top at a time when the profiteers who are opposing this measure were coining their millions at the expense of human misery.

The Government owes them this money, and everyone admits that some day it will be paid. Practically everybody admits that when it is paid the full value will be paid and that no interest will be charged against it. Then why not pay it now, when by doing so we can expand the currency, advance prices, and bring relief to all the American people.

But the enemies of this legislation tell you that this money is not due. If we had paid these boys the same interest that we paid the war contractors and profiteers on their deferred payments, every dollar of it would have been due in 1931.

Besides, if this depression were caused by an insulting foe from the outside there would be a demand for war—war which would probably cost us $20,000,000,000. Yet when we have an opportunity to expand this currency in an orderly way and pay $2,400,000,000 of American debts, without levying an additional dollar of taxes, and in doing so redeem America from a condition of distress worse than any war through which we have ever passed, we find that those who have contributed most to bring this condition about are bitterly opposing such a measure, misrepresenting it to the country, and demanding that Congress adjourn.

Permit me to say to you now that we are going to oppose any resolutions for adjournment until this bill is finally disposed of. If you succeed in defeating it, then we are going to oppose any motion to adjourn until something else is done to alleviate these terrible conditions. Any man who opposes this measure and who votes to adjourn Congress without offering something in its place that would give relief to our people admits one of two things: He admits either the failure of representative government or that he himself is incapable of offering any solution of our problems. In either case he should not have the audacity to offer for reelection.

As I have said before, this is a money panic. It is a man-made panic. It is a result of the distortion or abuse of the powers of government by the administration in power in passing laws or conferring authorities the effects of which were to distort or violate the laws of economics or the laws of supply and demand in order to enrich the few at the expense of the many.

Congress and the President have ample power to relieve this condition. The passage of this bill will do it. If you defeat it, then it is your patriotic duty to offer something in its place.

We are in the same predicament to-day that England was in a year ago. They were going through the same conditions we are going through now. The international bankers in that country set up the same cry they have set up here—"Balance the Budget, balance the Budget." They did just what we have done. They balanced their budget on paper, but when the taxes levied failed to yield sufficient revenues to maintain the government they found that they had to expand their currency, just as we are going to have to do before this condition is relieved. They did not have the gold reserve that we have, and therefore had to suspend the gold standard in order to expand. Conditions improved immediately, prices rose, their factories began to run, unemployment decreased, and to-day England is the most prosperous country under the shining sun.

We do not have to suspend the gold standard. We have sufficient gold to furnish 46 cents in gold reserve behind every dollar of this money, when the Federal reserve law requires only 40 cents. For a hundred years England had less than 10 per cent gold reserve behind her gold certificates.

Ex-Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, one of the ablest financiers in the world, the author of our present Federal reserve law, tells us that this proposition is perfectly sound and that it will restore commodity prices to their normal values almost instantaneously.

But men who have their money hoarded or invested in tax-exempt securities do not want the currency expanded, because their dollars have more buying power under the present distressed conditions. The large international bankers have $16,000,000,000 loaned in foreign countries. It is payable in American dollars. That $16,000,000,000 will buy more of American farm products than $60,000,000,000 would have bought the day those loans were made.

They do not want the currency expanded, because it would mean a rise in the price of commodities and the bringing down of the value of their hoarded dollars, which were invariably made by profiteering during the World War—coined, if you please, from the blood and tears of the suffering men, women, and children of the world.

They are trying to make you believe that this bill would impose an additional tax burden on the American people. They know that is not true. It would not levy one additional dollar of taxes; but, on the other hand, it would advance the prices of commodities to such an extent that it would make our present taxes more easy to pay.

But they tell you that the money issued under this bill would be "fiat" money. Every intelligent financier on earth knows that every dollar of this money would be backed by 46 cents in gold, when the Federal reserve law only requires 40 cents. All our money is interchangeable under the law, and every dollar of this money would be worth just as much as a gold certificate any day.

They tell you that it would bring uncontrolled inflation. As a matter of fact, under the Owen plan, provided in the bill, this expansion would be controlled. When commodity prices begin to rise to an abnormal level, the bonds held by the Federal reserve agent may be sold and the currency reduced until we are able to stabilize prices at something like what they were in 1926, 1927, or 1928.

Yes, we are at war, and these ex-service men throughout the country who are fighting this battle for the passage of a law that will expand this currency, break this panic, and pay off these adjusted-service certificates are rendering just as patriotic service to-day as they did on the battlefields during the darkest hour of the World War. They are fighting to redeem this country from the clutches of a panic more destructive of our civilization and more dangerous to the welfare of our country than any war in which we have ever engaged.

This bill is going to pass the House. It then goes to the Senate. If those Senators will study it until they understand it, it will pass that body by an overwhelming majority. If it becomes a law, then we will have won a victory for the masses of the American people as well as for the ex-service men that will be felt in every nook and corner of the United States as well as throughout the civilized world.

It will not be a victory that will leave the battlefield strewn with the dead and dying. It will not be a victory at the expense and at the destruction of the young manhood of the country. It will not be a victory that will leave broken hearts and vacant seats and widows' weeds in every home.

It will not be a victory that will place a crêpe upon the doorknob of every household in America, and fill every park and public place with the maimed, the blind, the wounded and disabled victims of a great conflict. It will not be a victory that will burden our people with an indebtedness that will take a hundred years to pay.

But, on the other hand, it will be a victory that will bring light and hope to practically every fireside in America, one that will restore prosperity to agriculture, take our laborers out of the bread line, bring justice to our service men, and inspire in them a new devotion to and a new reverence for our American institutions. It will be a victory that will cause our country to awaken as it were from this horrible nightmare and step forward into the light of a new day of peace, happiness, and prosperity for all. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I am supporting this bill because the whole country needs it, as well as these tatterdemalions of the victorious Army of 1918.

Those who oppose increasing the volume of currency base their opposition upon the danger of extreme inflation that would go to the point of a depreciated and worthless currency such as Germany produced after the war and finally outlawed in 1924.

I do not advocate, and I do not believe anyone advocates, such extreme inflation. I know it would amount to confiscation for those who hold bonds, notes, and mortgages. I would oppose any such confiscation, even with my own life.

But, on the other hand, we are suffering from an extreme deflation, both of currency and of credit. This extreme deflation is destructive of the debtor class. People who borrowed money a few years ago are now compelled to pay the same back in dollars worth two, three, and four times what they were when they were borrowed. It is not fair and should not be permitted.

Therefore, we are up to the choice of deciding on a moderate inflation to overcome the existing extreme deflation. Can there be anything unfair or unjust in such a middle course? Is it not right that a person who borrowed a thousand dollars when cotton was 20 cents a pound should be allowed to pay the same back with cotton of about the same price? If the man who lent the thousand dollars can now take the same money and buy four times as much cotton, five times as much land and houses, three times as much groceries, two times as much clothing, and so on through all the range of human wants, then has not the man who lent the thousand dollars been paid back two, three, four, and five times what he lent? Can anybody defend such a system as that? Is there any justice or fairness in any such system?

I do not mean that the lenders of money are to blame, but I do say that they are the beneficiaries of an unfair and of an unjust monetary system.

Scientific thinkers and trained economists have shown us how this can be overcome. The method is perfectly clear to the fair and unselfish mind that will study it long enough to get at the bottom of the facts. That is why I favor using the tremendous momentum of the bonus sentiment to increase the volume of currency in this country. If we can combine these two forces and distribute this more than $2,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes all over the Nation, undoubtedly business will begin to revive, commodity prices will rise, the dark cloud of depression will begin to disappear, and when once again the wheels of business begin to turn all the forces which have so long been stagnant will begin to pull and push for the restoration of normal business activities.

Mr. Chairman, I deeply sympathize with these ragged and tattered remnants and representatives of what was a glorious and victorious army in 1918. Sleeping upon the ground, and often in the mud, hiding in half-wrecked houses to escape the rain, living on the charity of their destitute friends, these unfortunate boys excite my deepest pity.

But I am looking beyond them. I know that they are but typical of millions of Americans in the same destitute condition. I know how the hearts of these men who are husbands and fathers must agonize and suffer to contemplate that their dependent ones have no shelter over their heads except through the enforced indulgence of landlords, have nothing to eat except at the hands of charity, and that disease, and death itself, constantly stare them in the face.

In view of these considerations, I compliment the men now about Washington for their good behavior, for their self-control, and for their splendid discipline. If the proposition to pay them the bonus at this time should fail, and it seems doomed to failure, in view of the certainty of a presidential veto, and of the impossibility of obtaining a two-thirds majority in both Houses, to override the veto, then I hope that all of these men will quietly and peaceably return to their homes and families. If there should be any disorder and violence traceable to them, either before they leave Washington or on their way home, it will reflect discredit upon them and their cause, and will undoubtedly injure them. As one who has manifested his genuine interest in them as fellow citizens, and as one who will vote for the pending bill, in the belief that not only will the ex-soldiers be benefited thereby, but that the whole country will be helped, and that this widespread distribution of new money will give the necessary stimulus to start business back up the hill, I am appealing to these men to continue in the same fine spirit and to display the same good conduct until they reach home.

All political and social problems in America can and should be settled at the ballot box. It takes time, and patience, and concerted action to achieve results by slow constitutional agencies, but it can be done, and every good American should restrain himself from violence and disorder, but go resolutely and calmly to the polls and record his deliberate judgment for the men who represent his political aims and his economic views.

So, once again, I appeal here to these former soldiers as I appealed to them in person in their camp at Anacostia to suppress all forms of disorder, to drive out drunkenness and bootleg liquor that would produce drunkenness, to refrain from any contact with communistic or red influences, to submit their cause to the Congress, to the President, and to the country, respectfully and quietly, and, if defeated, to accept the decision as good sports in true American spirit, and cheerfully and quietly return home. [Applause.]

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, when the Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Glover, asked every postmaster to support the President, he was not criticized and his position was not taken away from him. We had no remarks of disapproval from the administration, but in my State, when a member of the American Legion, who is in the civil service of the Government, a man who is a member of the resolutions committee of a post of the American Legion, saw fit, in view of the fact we had given billions of dollars to Wall Street, to favor giving a few dollars to Main Street by way of this bonus proposition, and passed a resolution to that effect, the Post Office Department makes this charge against him through Mr. Arch Coleman, First Assistant Postmaster General. This is count 2 in the charges:

> It is also charged that you introduced a bonus resolution at a meeting of the American Legion, Crown Point, Ind., March 6, 1931, contrary to the expressed wishes of the President, who considers such legislation harmful to the country at this time.

We have been told here that the President will veto this legislation, and this is his right; but I do not believe the membership of this House believes it is his right, in view of the action of the Assistant Postmaster General at Springfield, Mo., to go out and coerce civil-service employees to keep them from expressing their views, as citizens, on legislation, when they do this as members of an organization of World War veterans and at the instigation of that organization. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. Can the gentleman inform us whether this man lost his position or not?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not know whether he has or not.

Mr. BLANTON. If he has been fired, we will put him back next spring.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I want the House to know of this matter so that they may know the methods that are being used to defeat this bill. The rights of American citizens are certainly being violated. Does the constitutional provision providing for the "right of the people to peacefully petition" apply to all the people except civil-service employees in the Postal Service? Must postal employees, to retain their positions, agree to support every whim and caprice of the President of the United States under penalty of discharge if they do not? Such a system is unjust and most reprehensible. Neither the President of the United States nor the First Assistant Postmaster General will be able to defeat this legislation by any such methods.

There are gentlemen here who say that we should not vote in favor of the bonus, because it will never become a law. That it will not pass the Senate. Is that a reason for us to fail to do justice? Is that a reason for Members of the House to fail to follow their conscientious convictions of duty? Those gentlemen continue their argument and say if it does pass the Senate the President will veto it. Maybe the Chief Executive will veto it. He has consistently opposed it. He has stated that he will veto it. He has tried through the press to lead the Nation to believe that it is unnecessary, unwise, and unprofitable. He has inferred that it is unpatriotic for the men who defended their Government in time of war to expect that Government to aid and protect them in time of peace. He has enunciated a new theory of government—the theory that men are created for the benefit of government. It replaces the theory of the fathers that "governments are instituted for the benefit of men."

But do not be too sure, my colleagues, that he will veto this legislation. Pass it and see. I think that he will approve it. I have noticed that popular demand has its effect even on the Chief Executive. Witness the wet and dry issue; four years ago it was "a noble experiment." To-day, if newspaper accounts be true, it has lost some of its nobility. It has passed the experimental stage and, from all the press reports of the White House conferences, it has become a political dilemma, with a deep anxiety being evidenced by the President to jump on the side of popular demand.

I think that if we pass this bill here in the House and in the Senate the President will sign it. I hope that he will be as compassionate to the down and out, jobless, sick, heartless, burden-bearing veterans of the country as he was to the corporations and banks when he signed their $2,000,000,000 bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I have not lost faith in my President. I repeat, I think he will approve the bill.

On Saturday the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], an excellent gentleman, a handsome gentleman, and a gentleman whose articles appear in leading weekly publications giving his advice to young Congressmen, stated that the certificates should not be paid because he and others in Congress at the time of the passage of the original bill had agreed that payment would not be asked for until 1945. He called on his Republican colleagues to bear witness to that fact. Maybe he did make that promise. Maybe his Republican colleagues made it in the Republican caucus. By what right did they make it?

By what authority could the gentleman from South Dakota bind the veterans of this Nation to refrain from collecting a debt that the gentleman himself admits is a valid obligation of the Government? How can these veterans be bound by a contract made by the gentleman from South Dakota in which they had no part and of which they had no knowledge or opportunity to disapprove at the time? It would make an interesting subject for discussion in one of the gentleman's articles advising new Congressmen.

I have advocated payment of the adjusted-service certificates. I signed the petition to discharge the Rules Committee and bring the bill on the floor of the House for a vote.

Congress adjusted the pay of the railroads. It likewise adjusted the pay of war contractors in excess of $2,000,000. In recent years we have given other nations in excess of $10,000,000,000. We have allowed them to filch as much more from us in the sale of worthless bonds and securities. We have rehabilitated the Belgians and French, fed the Armenians and the Chinese—we have failed miserably in feeding our own.

None of the money we have given to business has trickled down to the farmer in my State. He is still selling his crops below cost of production. The banks for which two billion was provided and for which he is taxed are still foreclosing the mortgages on his farm. The laborer in my State is still unemployed. The tax collector is hauling away from his door his household goods. No one has money to buy. All of our Federal aid to big business has not helped him. We have tried starting at the top to revive industry and to save the farms. The plan has been a noticeable failure. It is time to begin to start at the bottom to erect our prosperity building. We have fully demonstrated that we can not start construction of a house with the roof. Let us change our method and begin with the foundation. Put money in circulation with the people. They are the ones who must buy to stimulate business—other means have failed. I opposed the other means—voted against them. They were contrary to economic law. This is a sound proposition. This will put more than four and one-half million dollars in circulation in the fifth congressional district of Indiana. It will put money in circulation in every township—in every precinct. It will permit men to pay debts, it will permit men to buy. It will stimulate business. We have the goods to sell. We lack buyers. We lack buyers because the man on the street lacks money.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation cost us in taxes. This will not increase taxes one cent. This will be paid out of the sinking fund that is now set aside under the law and matures in 1945. Inflation of currency. Yes. We need it. Under the present law we must have 40 per cent gold reserve back of our currency. That is all the law requires. Issue this new currency to pay these certificates and we will still have more than 40 per cent gold reserve back of our currency. The bill further provides that if currency should be inflated too greatly bonds will be held in trust by the Federal reserve against the sinking fund in sufficient amount to restore the stability of the currency.

The man in the street and on the farm will have money. I supported the resolution to discharge the Rules Committee, and now that the motion prevails, I shall vote for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates in cash and now. I have never made a promise for the veterans, as did the gentleman from South Dakota. But I did make a promise to them, and I shall keep my pledge.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I favor the Patman bill as amended by the Owen amendment.

It is surprising to see some stand-pat Republicans get up on the floor of the House and indicate how terrible it will be for the Nation and the Treasury if we increase the amount of money in circulation in order to adjust the compensation of the veterans, many of whom went through hell in the World War overseas for a dollar and a quarter a day, while the war profiteers had their claims adjusted to the tune of millions, if not billions, of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, there is not one valid reason why a Member can oppose this bill, because, as some have stated, it will start the printing presses in operation. Many Members who oppose the pending bill on those grounds supported bills to relieve the bankers, who have already done much to wreck the country, and would allow them to run the printing presses just because they have some bonds, many of which may be worthless. If you are fearful about these new bonds as a reserve for new money to pay the bonus, then let us take the billions of dollars that the foreign countries owe us, and their bonds which are now in the Treasury, and use them as a reserve in back of the alleged printing-press money to pay the veterans. This method would be on all fours with the proposition which you approve in giving to the bankers a right to obtain new currency upon depositing their bonds as a security reserve.

Some Members oppose the bill because they say it will interfere with balancing the Budget. I picked up the paper this morning and saw that the politician, Bishop Cannon, says that you can not balance the Budget with a corkscrew. I do not believe that these professional drys know anything about how to open up a beer bottle. You do not need a corkscrew to take the cap off. Bring back beer and you will not have so many sleepless nights worrying about balancing the Budget and about burdensome taxes. All that the dry-speaking, dry-voting, professional politician, prohibition fanatics know about a corkscrew balancing the Budget is by opening distilled liquors with a corkscrew. [Laughter and applause.]

You dry Members who oppose this bill in the name of the Budget and the financial condition of the Treasury do not have a leg to stand on. My friends, these veterans are not asking for something which they are not entitled to.

They are not bums. Ex-service men from Milwaukee, numbering about 60, in Washington for the last few days, have presented their request to Congress, and I understand after doing that they are going to return home. They have just as much right to present their request to Congress as have these fanatic prohibition lobbyists housed in the Methodist Building a few steps from this Hall of Congress. [Applause.]

These Milwaukee veterans are not bums. Many of them were members of the Forty-second and Thirty-second Divisions, in which a great many Wisconsin boys were fighting the battles of the international bankers, who are now opposed to this bonus measure. The soldiers in these two divisions made history in the World War. There was no division in the World War that made a more enviable record than did these two divisions.

The international bankers and war profiteers helped drive us into the World War, which resulted in piling up our national debt to the stupendous sum of over twenty-nine and one-half billion dollars. At the urgent request of many of these powerful forces now opposing the pending bill the war debts of foreign countries were scaled over $10,000,000,000. If America could stand that reduction, she certainly can stand the passage of the pending bill to pay the debt we owe the veterans who fought the war, many of whom have been unable to find a job for several years and who are hungry, ragged, and in despair. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. RAGON. I rise to see if we can not get some agreement as to closing debate on this section and all amendments thereto. The next section is the one which will present the crux of the whole matter. I ask that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the thought has been expressed that some of us have been coerced through fear to support this measure. I am of opinion that that is a charge that should not be leveled at the head of any man who desires to give expression on a measure in this House. If that were true, there is other legislation that has been brought before the House where the same charge of intimidation could be brought. I am sure that each and every one of us has conscientiously considered this matter of bonus payment, and I believe the expressions of which I speak are unworthy and should have no place in debating this great problem. I am voting for this bill, though I doubt if there are a half dozen men in the bonus army who are from my State. We had some here two or three months ago, who returned to the State of Washington. I have been questioned by only one man since this army came in respect to my position, and at that time I did not tell him my attitude or how I would vote on this measure.

This may be a momentous occasion in the history of this House. I saw nobody quivering when these other measures were brought before us—measures that dealt in sums equal to the amount carried in this measure. I say to you that the people of my district are not opposed to the passage of this legislation. Some men in business are opposed to it, but with the permission of this House I shall read a telegram which I received to-day, a telegram sent by the chairman of the Republican State committee of the State of Washington, who was a former State commander of the American Legion and who to-day is chairman of the Republican delegation attending the convention in Chicago. This telegram is addressed to the Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, Senator from the State of Washington, and reads as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., June 10, 1932.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Senate Office Building, Washington:

Before leaving for national convention to-night feel it my duty to advise you on what I think of bonus situation. After careful survey find at least 10,000 veterans and their families on charity in this State. Veterans are now nearly unanimous in this State in their desire that this just debt of the Government to them be paid. Marked swing of general public toward payment at this time, because they are beginning to realize that this money will be distributed throughout the country more equitably than by any other relief means, and the channels of trade will be stimulated by the ability of these veterans to pay their debts, meet their obligations, and buy food for their families, which so many are sorely in need of. The entire population will feel the benefit of this added money in circulation. Citizens coming to the conclusion that if $2,000,000,000 can be found to relieve banks, railroads, and insurance companies through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and billions for farm relief and over two billions for pork to build post offices in towns that do not need or want them without serious financial upheaval, then Congress should be able to find a way to pay a long overdue debt to its veterans. I believe this bonus matter to be the most serious economic measure before the American people to-day, and if not taken care of favorably by this Congress the very foundations of the Nation may be jeopardized before the summer is over. Will you please furnish copies of this telegram to our four Republican Congressmen at once?

HINTON D. JONEZ,
Past State Commander of the American Legion,
Chairman Republican State Committee,
Chairman Republican National Convention Delegation.

Gentlemen, I am not one of those who believe that payment of the adjusted compensation as provided in this bill will destroy the financial system of our Government. I think we all are agreed that the purchasing power of the dollar now is far beyond the 1926 quotation. Those of us who contracted debts 3, 4, or 5 years ago will now be compelled to liquidate on the basis of a dollar worth more than one and one-half times what it was worth at the time this loan was made.

We have already passed measures attempting to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar. The issuance now of $2,400,000,000 worth of Treasury notes will place in circulation more than $2,000,000,000 of actual money. This, without doubt, will have a tendency to lower the purchasing power of the dollar and result in a slight inflation of the currency. Nevertheless, such inflation will be properly controlled, as there is a definite limitation upon the increase in currency. I think we all realize that there should be legislation along these lines. And properly controlled as this issue is, it will not endanger the financial structure of our circulating medium, while on the other hand it will start sorely needed money through channels of trade.

This distribution of $2,000,000,000 could hardly be more general. In every nook and corner of the country this money will be distributed.

We heard no complaint from industry or business when we pledged our credit to assist the railroads, banks, and insurance companies, and I am not criticizing this relief. No complaint was evidenced when we voted millions for the relief of agriculture. Yet the payment of this just debt, which calls for no appropriation at this time, is criticized in some quarters. Many gentlemen refer to it as giving aid to a certain class as against other classes. In all legislation up to date we have designated different classes of industry for aid and refused aid to others.

It is true that the payment of this bonus will not in itself bring prosperity, but it will assist. With aid to industry and business, with aid to agriculture, with aid to unemployment, and with aid to the veterans, we may be able to stimulate trade and business which will eventually solve in part this business depression.

I realize that this money is not yet due. But, as I said, we granted moratoriums to nations and extension of contracts to individuals, so I can see no danger in reforming the contracts entered into with these veterans. We can readily see why banking interests would oppose the issuance of this money. Naturally, as they are in possession of the currency of the country, it is their desire to keep the purchasing power as high as possible. The same thing applies to any individual or corporation, as it is their thought to make their dollar as valuable as possible.

I do not altogether agree with the manner of raising this money, although I can not see the harm that many of my colleagues do see in this system. When we speak of bankrupting the financial institutions we are reminded that on our payment of the first half of the bonus, though conditions were not nearly as bad as they are now, we were told at that time that the country could not stand the strain. I am loathe at this time to accept from the same source the same warnings.

And I shall vote for this bill and hope that this great army will soon be dispersed to their homes, where they can take care of themselves and their families and start in circulation through the channels of trade moneys received under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I resent the condemnation that Gen. James G. Harbord has passed upon our ex-service men who have seen fit to come to their Nation's Capital. Who is General Harbord that he should tell these men that they have no right to come to Washington? Who is General Harbord that he should tell these men that they should leave their own Capital and go home? Why, of all the men in the Nation he should not be the one to do that. For 30 years he was educated by the Government at tremendous expense, and it has cost the Government thousands of dollars to complete and polish that education, and for years he has reveled in the lap of luxury at the people's expense.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Texas is not addressing himself to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I am discussing my own subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I resent this attack on General Harbord. He is one of the finest men in this country.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] and General Harbord are in the same box. They are each drawing $6,000 a year retired pay, in addition to their big salaries.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. You confer a great honor upon me by associating my name with that of General Harbord.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will suspend. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not proceeding in order. The gentleman has moved to strike out the last four words or made some other motion to get the floor. The last word is "residence." The gentleman must conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have not made any motion but I will make my motion now, in order that I may have general discussion.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman obtained the floor under some motion and now if he is permitted in the middle of his five minutes to make another motion, he will be entitled to five minutes more on that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I made no motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the gentleman at this juncture is not entitled to offer a motion. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask again what right has General Harbord to give orders to these ex-service men? It is true that he has been educated at Government expense. It is true that he draws from the Government $6,000 a year retired pay, as does also General MARTIN, and it is true that he draws a salary of at least $50,000 a year, and it is rumored that he draws $100,000 from the Radio Corporation of America.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I object. The gentleman from Texas is insulting one of the most honorable men in this country.

Mr. BLANTON. You sit down. I am going to give you orders now. Sit down! This is one time that you, a big major general, are going to take orders from a private. You sit down!

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Oregon has no right to interrupt my speech here, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, these retired generals have been so used to giving orders when they were in command that they can not get out of the habit. These ex-service men have just as much right to come to Washington as General MARTIN or General Harbord have and they have just as much right to stay here as long as they want to as these retired generals have.

Oh, I have seen these silk-hatted, white-spatted lobbyists of high finance come here and occupy their hundred-dollar apartments at Wardman Park Hotel, the Mayflower, or the Carlton and be received and entertained at the White House. It is all right for them to come. I have seen the high-finance lobbyists of railroads come here in their private trains. It is all right for them to come. I have seen the lobbyists of big monopolies—slick and pampered and big-bellied—come here from every part of the country, and be wined and dined and specially entertained for weeks and months, without one word of reproach from Gen. James G. Harbord. It is all right for them to come, but when the men who took that flag to victory in France want to come to their Nation's Capital, in perfect order, they are condemned by General Harbord, and ordered to leave here and go home. What right has he got to give them orders?

I want to say that I want to commend Gen. Pelham D. Glassford for taking care of these men. [Applause.] He proved that he is a real general, who thinks not of himself but of the welfare of his men. As long as I live I will be General Glassford's friend. He ought to have done exactly what he did do for these men. No one has had any right to criticize him. He did his duty. The Army ought to have seen to it that these ex-service men were properly housed. The War Department ought to have given them tents. They should not have been left to suffer in the rain. They ought to have had proper hospital facilities, and I say to you American Legion boys now in Washington you just stay here as long as you damned please. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; and General Glassford is making just as good a chief of police as he did on the fields of France in my own Twenty-sixth Division. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and he is going to properly look after our ex-service men here in Washington in spite of General MARTIN and General Harbord.

It is strange, indeed, Mr. Chairman, just what changes occur as the passing years roll around. Gen. James G. Harbord has his name to-day before the National Republican Convention at Chicago, as an active candidate for Vice President on the Republican ticket. The keynoter at this Republican convention is our former colleague who once served with us in the House, Hon. L. J. DICKINSON, of Iowa, who is now a United States Senator. All of you older colleagues remember the futile efforts Congressman DICKINSON made in 1923 to keep this same Gen. James G. Harbord from taking advantage of the people of the United States. You will remember that when he was only 56 years of age, in the very prime of manhood, General Harbord succeeded in getting Mr. Secretary Weeks, the Secretary of War in President Harding's Cabinet, to retire him on a salary of $6,000 per year for life, with all of his other many perquisites, so that he could take a position with the Radio Corporation of America, at a salary of $50,000 per year. Let me quote you what happened from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January, 1923. I quote the following from page 1909 of the RECORD for January 17, 1923:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSONS On page 19, after line 25, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for payment of any officer of the Army on the active or retired list while such officer is engaged in the business of selling supplies or services to the United States, or is employed by any individual, partnership, or corporation which engages in such business."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, the provision of the Navy bill of June 10, 1896, carries this provision with reference to retired and active officers in the Navy. Just now we have put in a similar provision as to the retirement of General Crowder. Now we have the retirement of General Harbord, who immediately becomes president of the Radio Corporation of America, not because he is an expert in radio but on account of the influence that they hope he will have in selling their products to the United States Government. I have no objection to his getting a good job, but I do say that if he is going to be engaged in the manufacture of articles for sale to the Government he ought not to be entitled to any retired pay in the Army. [Applause.] For that reason I want to see a provision of this kind put in with reference to retired officers or active officers in the Army, and I call attention to a clipping in the Chicago Tribune of the other day:

"The Radio Corporation, now headed by General Harbord, formerly Assistant Chief of Staff of Army, is one of the most powerful aggregations of capital in the world. Behind it are the General Electric Co. and the J. P. Morgan interests.

"ALLEGE CONTROL OF PATENTS

"The activities of the Radio Corporation, some of which are now undergoing investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, are alleged to be in the direction of establishing a wireless communication monopoly through control of patents, through exclusive traffic agreements, and through direct governmental grants and provisions conferring exclusive rights to valuable bands of wave lengths.

"The Radio Corporation is reported to have closed a large number of exclusive contracts which will prevent any serious competition in domestic and foreign wireless communication. In the case of a country where radio is a governmental monopoly such an exclusive contract would give the Radio Corporation a monopoly of wireless communication from that country to the United States."

The purpose of getting General Harbord in this job is on account of his acquaintance with the people who are occupying positions in the Army and Navy whom they hope to influence, that is all. If he is going to occupy this position and draw a salary for it, all right, but he should not receive a dollar of Government money out of the Public Treasury while he is so engaged, and I hope this amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

I want all of my colleagues and the country to note that this present Republican keynoter, Senator DICKINSON, of Iowa, on January 17, 1923, called attention to the fact that this 56-year-old major general had gotten himself retired on $6,000 a year for life and had been taken over by "the most powerful aggregation of capital in the world," the General Electric Co. and the J. P. Morgan interests, who were placing General Harbord at the head of their big monopoly, the Radio Corporation of America. Please be sure to note that Keynoter DICKINSON in 1923 said that they were taking over General Harbord not because he was a radio expert but "on account of the influence that they hope he will have in selling their products to the United States Government." Keynoter DICKINSON then further said:

The purpose of getting General Harbord in this job is on account of his acquaintance with the people who are occupying positions in the Army and Navy whom they hope to influence, that is all.

Was not that an indictment?

This House on said January 17, 1923, passed the Dickinson amendment, and the Senate finally killed it, but for which action General Harbord would not have been able to draw his retired pay of $6,000 per year from the Government, while this financial monstrosity used him, as Keynoter DICKINSON then said, to influence big contracts out of the Government for it. And since that—January 17, 1923—General Harbord has been permitted to practice his influence in getting contracts out of the Government, receive his salary of $50,000, which they say has since been increased to $100,000 per annum from the Radio Corporation of America, and at the same time draw his retired pay of $6,000 per annum from the Government and his other perquisites. Let me mention these other perquisites. He gets from the Government for himself and family all medicines, all medical treatment, all surgical treatment, all hospital facilities, all dental treatment, and he has the right of buying from Government stores at Government cost all of his family supplies and clothing, including coal, and so forth.

Has anyone ever contended that what then Congressman, now Senator L. J. DICKINSON said in January, 1923, about General Harbord is not true? No; it was not denied then, and it has never been denied since. Has anyone contended that Senator DICKINSON's assertions were untrue when he said that the General Electric Co. and the J. P. Morgan interests were taking over General Harbord at a tremendous salary for him to influence big Government contracts for them with Army and Navy officials? No; they have not. Has anyone ever impeached the standing and integrity of L. J. DICKINSON? No; they have not. He seems to stand fairly well with the National Republican Organization and the White House, for he was unanimously chosen the keynoter for the Republican National Convention now being held in Chicago.

You colleagues will remember that it was Secretary Weeks, President Harding's Secretary of War, who retired General Harbord at 56 years of age, and who criticized the House of Representatives for passing the Dickinson amendment, and who got the Senate to kill the amendment. I want to remind you that another prominent Republican, our former colleague from Kansas, Mr. Tincher, whom the Republicans in this House put up frequently on the floor to speak for their party, also condemned General Harbord, and at the same time condemned Secretary Weeks for criticizing Congress. I refer you to page 2210 of the RECORD for January 22, 1923, from which I quote the following:

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, yesterday morning we had one of the occasional outbreaks from the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War, in an interview, very carefully prepared, has again denounced Congress. I do not know whether he does these things as a pastime, or whether he is really serious about it. This time I think the denunciation calls for a little more attention than his ordinary denunciations, because this time he denounces our Government, and says that General Harbord should be ashamed of it. He says he considers the action of this House as an insult to the general. He says:

"I do not believe the people of this country wish its great defenders treated in such a shameful way, and I should think General Harbord would feel that a country that would shamefully submit to such treatment of one of its officers was hardly worth serving."

Now, you know what it means, gentlemen of the House, for a man holding the position of a Cabinet officer to speak in that way of your country. What is the occasion of those remarks? An amendment in the Army bill providing that—

"None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used in the payment of any officer of the Army on the active or retired list while such officer is engaged in the business of selling supplies or services to the United States, or is employed by any individual, partnership, or corporation which engages in such business."

Why should Secretary Weeks say that? The law, the substitutive law, pertaining to the Navy and the retired men of the Navy, has carried this provision since 1896. Why? What would you think of Congress if it did not put this provision in? We educate a man as an officer of the Army, no matter who he is, and we give him association with all the men who use the hundreds of millions of the people's money and buy supplies for the Government, and we let him be its buyer for a few years, and then we retire him with a good fat salary, paid from the Treasury of the United States.

Then the Government lets him take up the work of selling supplies to those men whom he has trained and associated with, the supplies to be paid for out of the Federal Treasury. It is not any reflection upon the officer. It is good, sound sense and business judgment. In all the instances where Congress has had a conflict with the present distinguished Secretary of War, Congress has been right and Secretary Weeks has been wrong. [Applause.]

I do not know whether Weeks ought to resign or not, but I do not know how they would do any worse. [Applause.] I think if Secretary Weeks had been a little more attentive to such as this Dickinson amendment and had read a little more about what is right and what is wrong, he might still be over in the other end of the Capitol serving as a result of the verdict of the voters of his own State. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. He will be a little more careful hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, based upon my House Joint Resolution No. 355, upon which it held extensive hearings for several weeks, the Committee on Military Affairs brought in a measure here the other day and passed it which will stop big retired Army and naval officers from drawing retired pay where they draw a salary from the Government of as much as $3,000 per annum. If this bill passes the Senate, and is signed by the President, it will stop my good friend from Oregon, General MARTIN, from drawing his retired pay of $6,000 while he is drawing a salary of $10,000 at the same time from the Government. Probably the passage of this measure has caused General MARTIN to interrupt me so many times on this floor recently. Why have I not the right to discuss General Harbord? And I am calling attention to these facts because I am insisting on the Committee on Military Affairs bringing in here and passing another provision of my resolution, H. J. Res. 355, which provides that any retired officer of this Government who draws a big salary from a corporation shall not at the same time draw retired pay from the Government. This would reach General Harbord. When he gets retired he is presumed to have reached the age, or the condition, when his services would no longer be of value to the Government. If he can draw a salary of $50,000 or $100,000 per annum from the Radio Corporation of America, he should not draw retired pay from the people of the United States.

I want at this time to give you the entire picture. I want you to have the rest of Keynoter DICKINSON's handling of General Harbord. I quote from page 2349 of the RECORD of January 24, 1923:

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, an amendment offered to the Army bill on the floor of the House under date of January 17, 1923, bearing upon the right of retired and active officers of the Army to become employed by persons or corporations selling either service or material to the Government, has attracted the attention not only of the Secretary of War but also some of the leading daily newspapers of the country. I refer to the statement of Secretary of War Weeks, issued and published in last Sunday's Washington Star on January 21, 1923, and also to an editorial appearing in the New York Times under date of January 22, 1923, bearing upon this subject.

The underlying principle involved in this legislation is as old as the Book of Books, and was advocated by the Master of Men when He proclaimed "That no man can serve two masters." [Applause.] It is the old rule of agency, that any person attempting to represent two interests that conflict, at the same time, does not faithfully serve either. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that practically every State in the Union has long since passed laws controlling the Commonwealth and the municipalities of their respective States to the effect that no man holding public office can become a vendor of either service or material to such Commonwealth or municipality. This prohibition is imposed upon the State and municipality alike. Why strew the pathway of the Army officers or the Navy officers with temptation?

Under date of June 10, 1896, a permanent law was passed affecting officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, as follows:

"And provided further, That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after this date."

I note with regret that the Naval Affairs Committee of the House has favorably reported House bill 11002, with Report No. 835, providing—

"that all laws or parts of laws prohibiting officers on the retired list of the Navy from accepting employment with concerns furnishing supplies to the Government * * * are hereby repealed."

So far as I am able to learn, no hearings were held upon this phase of the bill, and I regret that such provision has been placed in the bill.

The retiring provisions of the Army and the Navy acts should be such as to encourage men to stay in both branches as long as they are useful to such organization, and the employment in outside enterprises by such retired officers should be discouraged, and particularly when such officers desire to enter into an activity wherein they are going to become instrumental in selling supplies to the Government, for either Army or Navy purposes. I am glad that such repeal provision will not be presented to the Senate in House bill 7864, and I hope that if House bill 11002 is presented to the House, that a sufficient number of Members will vote against the same to strike out the provision heretofore referred to.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio has just stated that he did not believe in making exceptions in the case of officers. I think the gentleman from Ohio is one of those who voted for the statute whereby General Harbord was made an exception and permitted to serve two terms in Washington of four years each, as against the general law which requires them to serve four years and then go out in the field.

Mr. DICKINSON. I shall refer to that a little later.

I call your attention to the fact that if this policy is carried out we would soon have retired naval officers controlling the organizations that provide the material for the building of our ships while receiving their retired pay from the Government; we would have a circle within a circle; corporations and concerns manned by officers of our Government promoting legislation for their own interests and selling their material to their respective departments, regardless of the interests of the public in general.

In the month of December, 1922, and about December 29, the Secretary of War, however, gave his approval for the retirement of General Harbord, even though his efficiency is not curtailed, his health is good, and no argument can be presented for his retirement except his desire to take up a more lucrative field of employment. Permit me to read from the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee considering the Army appropriation bill, on page 802 thereof:

"I do want to say that the department and the Army have suffered a very serious loss in the retirement of General Harbord. The conditions were such that I could not refuse to approve his application to go on the retired list."

It has long been the policy of the War Department not to retire Army officers after 30 years' service unless they have become inefficient or are in ill health, and, barring the readjustment that had to be made when the Army was reorganized under the reorganization act, this policy should be the policy of the War Department in the future. Under all these conditions, I am thoroughly convinced that the Secretary of War was not justified in permitting the retirement of General Harbord as suggested.

As a further reason for the adoption of the amendment heretofore referred to, I want to state that, in my judgment, numerous Army officers are now holding lucrative positions with corporations and concerns manufacturing materials to be sold to the War Department, and that the practice in behalf of the Army can not be justified any more than it can for the Navy, and that this amendment not only should be retained in this appropriation bill, but should be later enacted into permanent law.

In this connection I want to call your attention to the fact that the radio equipment of both the Army and the Navy, built up during the war, by reason of recent improvements and inventions is now practically obsolete; that in the near future all of this equipment must be replaced with the new and up-to-date equipment at large expense; that, in my judgment, within the next few years this Government will be spending millions of dollars for radio equipment, and will be invited to purchase the same through the Radio Corporation of America if its present plans are carried out; and I contend, in view of these facts, that in the first place General Harbord should not have retired, because he is rendering the most efficient service of any time during his career; that the Secretary of War should not have approved his application to retire; and that this legislation should be passed as a warning to officers in the Army that it will not be the policy of our Government to foster them for years as junior officers and then when they acquire the highest efficiency that they shall seek retirement and go on retired pay in order to become connected with some corporation that can pay them lucrative salaries. It should be the determination of every officer to remain in the service as long as his age and his health will permit him to render service to the Government. Any other policy is derogatory to an efficient Army or an efficient Navy. General Harbord is 56 years of age, has at least eight years of time that he should give to this Government rather than to the service of the Radio Corporation of America while at the same time receiving 75 per cent of his pay as an Army officer.

If General Harbord through his efficiency has secured perfect service in the work referred to, and if he is still in perfect health, tell me why it is not his duty to continue to serve this Government that has so long fostered him and developed him to the man that he is now reported to be? In my judgment, under these conditions, if General Harbord desires to leave the service of the Army, he should resign, not retire on 75 per cent pay, in order to enter upon this service.

If the retired officers of the Army are now engaged in the enterprise of manufacturing material for the sole purpose of making sales thereof to the Government, then there is all the more reason why this law should not only be passed, but that an investigation should be made as to how far retired Army officers are interested in such enterprises, and a report made to Congress with reference thereto. It is my purpose to ask the Secretary of War, either through the introduction of a resolution in this House or through some other channel, to furnish to this House a statement of the list of retired officers engaged in such enterprises and connected with concerns selling materials to the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. Chairman, just why do we continue to allow these conditions to exist? Why have we not passed the Dickinson amendment? Why have we not stopped Army officers and naval officers from drawing retired pay and additional big salaries, Navy officers from retiring in the prime of life to take lucrative positions with big corporations, and sell their influence? We must stop it. I wonder why Keynoter DICKINSON got lukewarm on this subject? Why has he not pursued it? It is just as important a problem to be solved to-day as it was in January, 1923.

And why is it, Mr. Chairman, that whenever any of us from this floor discuss these important questions, you find some other major general getting up here and trying to stop us? Do they all stand together? Are they here to protect one another? Does not the same responsibility rest upon their shoulders to stop this practice that rests upon mine? Why do I not have their help and cooperation, rather than their obstacles? This is a fight that I am going to carry on until the matter is corrected. And when I start a fight, I have the reputation of not stopping, until the abuses stop.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Strike out section 509, page 1, line 6, and insert the following:

"PAYMENT OF PRESENT VALUE OF CERTIFICATES

"SEC. 509. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder, the amount of the net single premium determined as of the last anniversary of the certificate necessary to purchase a paid-up endowment insurance for the face amount of the certificate at the then attained age of the certificate holder for the unexpired portion of the original 20-year period, on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually: Provided, That no payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, or until all obligations for which the certificate was held for security have been paid or otherwise discharged: Provided further, That upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled."

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes to explain the amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. I reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Payments of the face value of adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to have engraved and printed a sufficient amount of Treasury notes, in the denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $25, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000 each; such Treasury notes shall be full legal tender, noninterest bearing, exempt from all taxes, including Federal, State, and subdivisions thereof.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGON: Strike out all of section 2 of the bill, commencing on page 4, line 17, down to and including line 2 on page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

"He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

"He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

"These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

"Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for these notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation."

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. KLEBERG to the amendment offered by Mr. RAGON: Strike out the fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of the substitute and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the purpose of paying the interest on and retiring the bonds issued under the authority of the preceding paragraph, there is hereby created in the Treasury a special cumulative sinking fund. Into such fund there shall be paid the proceeds of the tax provided for in the following paragraph. All amounts in such sinking fund are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the payment of the interest on such bonds, and the payment of the principal thereof at maturity, or for the redemption or purchase thereof before maturity by the Secretary of the Treasury at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, and shall be available until all such bonds are retired. Bonds purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund shall be canceled and retired and shall not be reissued. In case the amount paid into such fund in any fiscal year exceeds the annual increment determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary to provide for the payment of interest on such bonds and the payment of the principal of such bonds at maturity, the excess shall be held in such sinking fund for the two succeeding fiscal years, and at the end of the second fiscal year, such part of such excess as continues to be a surplus above the second succeeding annual increment, shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"For the purpose of providing funds necessary for the purposes of this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid into the sinking fund hereinbefore provided for, on all nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar nonintoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a tax at the rate of 3 cents per pint, such articles to be bottled at the brewery. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment to the amendment is not germane. A sufficient amount has been read to show that it is clearly not germane, and I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the former ruling of the Chair on this same point, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, in order that the record may be clear, may I make an observation in connection with the ruling of the Chair, not only on this amendment but also on the previous amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] because I fear the decision as a precedent.

Necessarily, any appropriation of Government funds or any plan or scheme to pay money out of the Treasury in any method involves the acquisition of that money by the Government. The only method the Government has of acquiring money is by taxation. I believe any bill that appropriates money can also provide the method of acquiring that money by taxation. Of course that would not be true on appropriation bills because of the special rule relating to such bills providing legislation on an appropriation bill. On other bills which are in themselves legislation, other legislation raising the funds necessary to carry out the proposal is properly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If that were true, the Chair may state to the gentleman from New York, all appropriation bills would necessarily carry a revenue-raising provision.

Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I rely upon the Chair, and leave the matter to the judgment of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, personally I do not feel there is a Member of the House who would entertain for a moment the payment of these adjusted-compensation certificates at this time if they had to be paid out of the now lean Treasury of the United States. I think there are but few Members who would indorse an uncontrolled issue of currency to meet the payment of these adjusted-compensation certificates at this time. So far as I am concerned I certainly would not; but under the provisions of the amendment I have just offered this issue of the currency would be made and at the same time the Government of the United States would issue bonds in the amount of the currency issue. Those bonds would bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and be due and payable in a period of 20 years. These bonds would be placed with the Federal reserve banks to act as the agent of the United States.

Now, this bill, of course, is the Owen plan, except in order to make it entirely parliamentary we have eliminated one provision which, the parliamentarian advised us, if left in, would render it subject to a point of order, the eliminated provision being the 1926 dollar value as the yardstick upon which we would always keep the dollar. Therefore as the amendment is now drawn it provides that the Federal Reserve Board may, by resolution, in writing, direct the sale to the public of such portions of such bonds as it may from time to time desire.

These bonds would be placed in the Federal reserve banks' hands as the agent of the United States Government, and if the issuance of this amount of currency would have the tendency to wreck the dollar's value for the time being, the Federal Reserve Board could in a written direction release so much of these bonds as would bring that stability to the dollar which the Federal Reserve Board thinks would be proper.

I want to suggest that these bonds are not released, they are not disposed of in any way save and except at the discretion and direction of the Federal Reserve Board. While, in fact, they do draw interest, it is a mere bookkeeping proposition between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury, and the interest would not be effective and chargeable until the bonds were sold.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. For a brief question, but I want to get through in five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to get the matter clear. First, the currency is issued to meet the obligation of the certificates.

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And at the same time bonds are delivered to the Federal reserve banks and from time to time these are put on the market. Would not that cause a double liability? Would not that withdraw some of the outstanding currency that is also a liability?

Mr. RAGON. It would withdraw a certain amount of that currency, of course; but it is not a double liability.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And, if the gentleman will yield, that is the very purpose of the bill.

Mr. RAGON. Let me state this, without further interruption, as the gentleman from Kentucky states, that is the control feature of this currency issue.

I asked Doctor Fisher, of Yale, and I think he is perhaps the foremost economist we had before the committee, if this was sound economics, and he said that it was. I asked him if the money mechanics of this proposition was feasible and practical, and Doctor Fisher stated that it was.

Mr. Chairman, Doctor Fisher was opposed to paying the bonus because he said he did not think it ought to be paid at this time inasmuch as it was not due until 13 years from now under his construction. However, he said, so far as my amendment is concerned, it was a practical and feasible plan for a proper and much needed expansion of the currency.

The great good which I feel would come to the country through an expansion of the currency is one of the things which prompts me to support this bill.

This was the position, I think, of every economist who came before the committee. They stated it would be the solution of some of our problems, and under this bill it is met by a controlled expansion of the currency by the Federal Reserve Board. The bill we are considering, commonly known as the Patman plan, makes absolutely no provision for control of this great issue of currency. When the provision in the amendment I have proposed was voted down in the Ways and Mean Committee, I could not vote to favorably report the pending bill because of its failure to control this expansion. After this bill was voted out of the committee it was agreed by friends of the legislation that we bring it up under the petition to discharge and amend the bill by incorporating the terms of the amendment which I have proposed, and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, with the presentation of this amendment to section 2 by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], we have probably reached the final form in which its proponents will offer this bill for passage. It has not been an easy task to devise a scheme by which nearly two and one-half billion dollars might be paid out without expense, loss, or obligation on the part of the Government. In fact, the effort has failed, as shown even by the form of the proposal now finally presented. That it would fail, in fact, was a foregone conclusion.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation for the immediate payment of adjusted-compensation certificates proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], has passed through a process of evolution or metamorphosis during this session of the Congress. The gentleman has successively introduced and supported three bills. The ultimate purpose of each of them has been the same, namely, the immediate payment of these certificates, but the procedure for financing these payments has varied. The first bill, H. R. 1, introduced on December 8, 1931, merely authorized appropriations for the payment of the bonus without prescribing any method for obtaining the necessary funds. The second bill, H. R. 7726, introduced on January 14, 1932, and adversely reported by the Committee on Ways and Means on May 7, 1932, provided for the payment of the bonus in Treasury notes which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to have printed and which should be "full legal tender, non interest bearing, exempt from all taxes, including Federal, State, and subdivisions thereof."

Why it was provided that these Treasury notes, which in fact would be nothing but fiat currency, should be described as "noninterest bearing" and "exempt from all taxes," might be a matter of curious inquiry; are they essentially different from other forms of currency? The third bill, H. R. 11992, which the supporters of this legislation now propose to substitute in large part for H. R. 7726, provides for the same kind of payment to the veterans in Treasury notes which are to be "legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank." The application of some of these provisions is not clear, but it is manifest that these Treasury notes are also fiat money, as determined by the manner and source of issue. However, both the last bill, H. R. 11992, and the amendment to H. R. 7726, now offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], taken from H. R. 11992, incorporate what is called "the Owen plan," under which the Secretary of the Treasury shall "issue a like amount" (with the Treasury notes) of United States bonds bearing semiannual interest at 3½ per cent per annum, due and payable in 20 years from date of issue and subject to the right of redemption after 10 years. These bonds are to be deposited in the Federal reserve banks and, under the Ragon amendment, such portions of them as the Federal Reserve Board "may from time to time desire," shall be sold to the public when the Federal Reserve Board shall so direct. The amendment states no basis or requirement for such sale other than the "desire" of the board. Thereupon follows a very peculiar and significant provision to the effect that the currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the Treasury notes paid to the veterans for their bonus certificates and these Treasury notes shall then be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

Apparently the Treasury notes given to the veterans are considered to be of lesser or baser value than other currency, as the other currency is to be exchanged for these particular Treasury notes, and these notes are thereupon to be retired from circulation, with no provision for their reissue.

The Ragon amendment makes one important deviation from the Owen plan. It omits all reference to the "restoration" and the maintenance of the purchasing power of the dollar. What a cruel blow to the advocates of this bill as the "greatest step" to the immediate return of prosperity.

After all the argument about the expansion of currency and the stabilization of commodity prices as a result of this legislation it is now proposed, under the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] to omit from the pending bill the portion in H. R. 11992 which provided that the Federal Reserve Board should sell the bonds deposited with it only "in the event that the purchasing power of the dollar in the wholesale commodity markets, as ascertained by the United States Department of Labor, shall at any time fall as much as 2 per cent below the average value of the year 1926," and that then the sale should be "to the public of such portions of said bonds as may from time to time be necessary to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the normal standard of 1926." Of course, the elimination of this provision has vastly minimized the danger of inflation by issuance of Treasury notes, but, on the other hand, it will necessarily result in the immediate flotation of bonds by the Federal Reserve Board and thereby in the increase of the national debt by the amount necessary for the full payment of the adjusted-service certificates. In other words, the bill now necessitates both increased taxation and increased indebtedness, the very things which its proponents have professed to have avoided by the Owen plan.

In his statement before the Committee on Ways and Means the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] emphasized that "unless we can show that the payment of these adjusted-service certificates will benefit the country, promote the general welfare, we are not entitled to win, we are not entitled to have this bill pass." Labored efforts have been made in the debate to prove that the immediate payment of these certificates, which will not be due until 1945 and later, is sought for the benefit of the country generally and not so much for the benefit of the holders of the certificates. Also, it has been repeatedly said that this payment "will not cost the Treasury anything." Realizing the danger of and objection to purely fiat currency to be used in payment, proponents now say that the wonderful Owen plan protects aganst undesirable inflation of prices; because whenever danger of such inflation appears, bonds are to be sold for the retirement of the Treasury notes, which are admittedly fiat currency in the first instance. Of course, these bonds will have to be paid and the interest upon them will have to be paid, so that when the total amount of bonds authorized under the legislation have been sold, they will have cost the Government the total amount of the bond issue, which is equivalent to the total amount of the issue of the Treasury notes, plus interest on the total sum at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

In other words, since $2,300,000,000 are now required to pay the adjusted-service certificates, the bonds which will be sold to protect the country against the effect of the inflation of the Treasury notes will cost the Government $2,300,000,000 in principal and in addition $1,610,000,000 for interest during the 20 years of their duration. The scheme might be termed clever and even subtle, but the cloven hoof is discernible under the mantle of financial legerdemain. Of course, in the last analysis the proposition resolves itself into the simple elementary formula that wealth or property, or even governmental resources, can not be evolved out of nothing. Eventually, if not immediately, the burden will have to be borne by the taxpayers of the country; but the disturbance and demoralization of confidence, credits, and of the hope for early economic recovery will be instantaneous. The result will be the same, whether the country believes that we have embarked upon monetary inflation by issuing fiat currency or that we have camouflaged the issuance of such currency by an ultimate additional bonded indebtedness that will eventually cost the Nation $4,000,000,000.

But, assuming that either one of these schemes is workable, that we can pay the adjusted-service certificates immediately out of appropriations out of the Treasury as provided by H. R. 1, or by unsecured Treasury notes as provided by H. R. 7726, or by such Treasury notes plus an eventual bonded indebtedness cost of $4,000,000,000, why should this method be employed to pay an indebtedness or obligation of the Government which will not be due for 13 years in preference to all other objects that might be attained by an immediate expenditure of $2,300,000,000?

Of course, the only true and complete answer is that the adjusted-service certificates will receive this preference because they represent the interests and demands of a group of large numerical and political strength. If that is not so, why do we not employ this method exclusively for the benefit of the needy and the unemployed, rather than for a group of whom many are not in want and many are objecting to this immediate payment? Of course, it might be asked, why not use these $2,300,000,000 for the immediate balancing of the Budget, or for the reduction of tax burdens, or even for the doubtful benefit of promoting public works?

Proponents of this legislation have said that they would be opposed to it if it meant an increase in the tax burden or the issuance of fiat currency. What else does it mean? Either these Treasury notes are not to be redeemed at all, or they are to be redeemed through the sale of bonds under the Owen plan. Either way, the proposal is the most uneconomical, hazardous, and illogical that the Congress might adopt at a time when we are imposing enormous tax burdens and reducing salaries and other expenditures for the purpose of balancing the Budget and when we are compelled to provide other large funds, not as gratuities but as loans, to rehabilitate and maintain both public and private credit and stability.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] a moment ago referred to Prof. Irving Fisher. It is true that the gentleman from Arkansas asked Professor Fisher before the Ways and Means Committee whether he had studied the Owen plan, and he replied "yes." He then asked Professor Fisher whether it was a sound measure. He answered: "That is a perfectly sound method, I think, if you are going to do the thing." Professor Fisher was discussing the use of bonds as against the issue of fiat currency. I do not think that any of us would claim that the increase of the indebtedness of the United States by $2,300,000,000 immediately, and eventually by even $4,000,000,000, might not be safe, but it certainly would not be prudent or wise. I think, too, that Professor Fisher was only discussing the mechanics of it, as I understood the gentleman from Arkansas himself to observe.

It is possible to sell bonds, but what is the result of the sale of bonds? Why have we been here for six months talking and legislating about reducing expenditures and raising taxes? Why did we have such a spirited discussion the other day about the President's alleged statement that we are $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 short of balancing the Budget? What difference would that make, if all we need to do is to pass a resolution here to issue $2,300,000,000 of Treasury notes and then sell bonds with which to pay them? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, all our sympathy for the veterans, all our desire to aid them now and show our appreciation of their loyal sacrifices and privations during the war, do not justify us in jeopardizing the welfare of the Nation, including the veterans themselves, by striking a blow at all hope for immediate economic recovery from the distressing depression from which all the people are suffering alike. United we can stand, divided we may fall.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, Congress is now called upon to decide whether or not it will rearrange terms of the World War compensation or bonus certificates, and make immediate settlement of them by cash payments.

After the World War was over, by an act of Congress, it was determined that the compensation received by soldiers during the World War was not a fair amount paid to them. While business and labor were receiving enormous profits and wages, soldiers were serving their country for a dollar a day, much of which was taken from them in allotments to dependents, insurance, fees, and other charges, which amounts were deducted from the small pay they were receiving.

Seven and one-half years after the war was over, Congress passed what was known as the bonus law, which provided that soldiers, sailors, and so forth, who served in this country, should receive an additional dollar a day for the time they served—not to exceed $500. Those who served in foreign countries were to receive a dollar and a quarter a day—not to exceed $625. This was not to be paid in cash, in fact no cash at all was paid. These amounts were figured at a compound rate of interest and given the World War veterans in the form of an insurance certificate to be paid 20 years later. In other words, these obligations all will mature and become payable at their face value in 1945. A sinking fund has been provided by law, which, if it is supported, will be enough in amount to pay off the certificates when they become due. The obligation of the Government is absolutely fixed.

Last year because of the distressing condition of the country Congress passed a law which provided that loans up to 50 per cent of the value of these bonus certificates would be made by the Government, because of the stressed times in which the people found themselves, and veterans in a great majority of instances having come from the most needy classes of our people, availed themselves of the opportunity and borrowed heavily on their certificates.

BIG INTERESTS OPPOSE BONUS

The financial interests of our country, and I believe the big-business class that made the most profit out of the war, have opposed constantly any payment to the veterans. They opposed strenuously the original bonus law which sought to provide a fair amount of compensation to the veterans. They opposed the law last year which proposed to make loans to the veterans. They are now strenuously opposing the bill which would make payment in cash to soldiers, covering the balance due on their certificates.

MONEY USED WISELY BY SOLDIERS

It is often charged that the money paid to the veterans is wasted, and is used by them in an unprofitable way. That may be true in many instances—no doubt it is. The same can be said of business men everywhere who have done very foolish things in recent months, but in many other instances the loans that were made last year provided the funds among the poorer classes of our people, on which the family was able to make a crop and grow food and provisions on which to live. I believe that we can safely say that more than 90 per cent of the loans made in all sections of the country to the soldier in the family, was put to good account and furnished provision on which the family made a crop. It paid debts in many instances and brought relief to other members of the family other than the service man.

When I returned home last summer, hundreds of people told me that they could not possibly have made a crop but for the loan made on the bonus certificate to the soldier in the family. I believe that was a good business proposition for our Government, because it distributed relief among the needy and the distressed. It went not only to the soldier but it went to his family, his loved ones, and those dependent on him. The situation this year is no improvement over last year. Nine million laborers are out of employment. Thirty million people are in need, many of them being in destitute circumstances.

The obligation of the Government does not cease with paying off the bonus-certificate contract. Any just government must provide for the welfare of its citizens. When they have done all it is possible for them to do to labor and secure the necessaries of life, then if the government is to stand, it must come to their rescue, not with doles and handouts but in a statesmanlike way. It must solve their problem by making it possible for them to labor, secure food on which to live, and clothing to keep them from suffering. No surer way can be found to distribute to our people, especially the poorer classes, relief and financial assistance than by making payment at once to the World War veterans of the balance we are obligated to pay them on their insurance certificates.

We have provided loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the banks, railroad companies, life-insurance companies, and the other large financial institutions of the country. I believe it is right that we should have used the Nation's credit to serve these business institutions, because the welfare of so many people, even in the humbler walks of life, is dependent on these institutions surviving. We raised the money with which to make these loans selling Government bonds, which is a charge against the credit of our country, and the bonds must later be paid by taxes levied on the people. I voted for these measures. I think I did right in doing so. I am going to vote for the immediate settlement of the balance due the World War veterans on their bonus certificates because now is a real time of need with them. I think I will be right in supporting that measure also.

NO NEW BURDEN ON TAXPAYERS

Those who oppose this course say that the country can not at this time afford to make this payment. That is not a fact. Under the arrangement we are proposing to-day Government bonds will be issued and sold to raise the money with which to meet the payments on the bonus certificates. Instead of having an outstanding obligation in the form of nonnegotiable bonus certificates which will mature in 1945, the Government will have an outstanding obligation in negotiable bonds, which will mature and be taken up by the same sinking fund which is now provided and shall accumulate to pay all bonus certificates in 1945. No additional taxes need be levied because of the change from the Government's obligation on the bonus which bears interest, to its obligation on the bonds used in paying off the certificates, which bonds also bear interest. The only difference under the plan is that the soldier may be now, when he is most in need, able to use that which the Government has already promised to pay him for the service he rendered in fighting for his country. There is a great need for more money throughout the land. Business is stagnant because the people do not have money. We must supply trade and commerce in business with more money or they will perish for lack of buying power in the people. There is no better way, as I have stated, to help business in every way than to bring relief to the poor and suffering classes of our people by paying to the lowest as well as the highest the balance that is due him on his World War certificate.

I will vote for the bill, believing that it is the best thing to be done for the soldiers, for their families and dependents, for business, professional men, and for our Government itself.

The fear of the Members of this House seems to be that this Government may produce what would be termed unsound money. The currency statement issued by the Treasury Department on April 30, 1932, shows $5,464,000,000 of currency in circulation. I direct your attention to the basis on which some of that currency was issued. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] suggested yesterday that "money is supposed to represent some value." Keep that in mind.

The first thing I will examine among the currencies outstanding is the silver currency. I found that in dollars and coins in smaller denominations there was $845,000,000 of silver currency in circulation. What is the commodity silver in that currency worth? About 28 cents per dollar. The commodity value of all that silver was $236,600,000; no more. But the money as a circulating medium is worth $845,000,000. So we are bound to conclude that the difference of $608,400,000 is purely fiat money. We must conclude that the difference between the commodity price of the silver and circulating medium or value is fiat money and nothing else, and gentlemen say it is not good money.

The next kind of money I wish to examine is the national bank notes. You will see from the daily statement that came into your office from the Treasury this morning that there is $737,000,000 of national-bank money or notes outstanding. What value are they based on? They are not based on any value. They are issued on a basis that is worse than no value at all. They are issued on bonded debts of the Government of the United States: They are issued on the 2 per cent bonds called consols and the Panama 2 per cent bonds. What are those bonds? They are debts, nothing but debts of the Government. Do you say that is an asset? Is the currency sound? Yes; it is sound for the same reason that fiat silver is sound. Taking those two items alone I found that of the currency outstanding there was $1,345,000,000 based on no value at all, but was simply printed or "fiat" money not backed by values of any kind.

Now we passed the Glass-Steagall bill, and under that we can issue Federal reserve notes, which are money. How much of those Federal reserve notes was issued on Government debts? We find in this morning's statement that $360,200,000 of Governments debts, which are in the form of Government bonds, are the basis for the issuance of these Federal reserve notes or money. So it would seem that of our outstanding money, $5,464,000,000, the sum of $1,705,600,000 is based on no value at all. Yet this money is sound. No currency is sound except the world and the people have faith in the ability of the country issuing the money and the standing of that country financially.

The ability of that country lies in the tangible properties and in the incomes of its people. That is the reason our currency is good in this country, not because of the gold so much, not because of the debts that it is issued on, but because with the reasonable exercise of the taxing power of the United States, money can be raised from the people and these debts redeemed. This is the only reason the currencies or moneys are good.

A great deal has been said here about "printing-press money." The amount of currency or money outstanding in any country should be kept in a proper relation to the needs of commerce, industry, and trade in that country. If the amount of money, even gold, is greatly in excess of the needs of the people, money will become cheap and commodities high. If the amount of money, even paper currency becomes scarce in relation to the needs of trade and commerce, then the money will become high. It is not now so much the "kind" of money that effects its value, but the "supply in circulation" that determines the value. Germany to-day is practically on a paper-currency basis, but the amount of paper currency is limited to the needs of the trade and commerce of the country. Germany is off the gold standard, and her money is not redeemable in gold, but the mark is selling almost at par because the amount is limited.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, provided I may have five minutes to explain my amendment, which was voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. All the money under this law would be interchangeable and the money that would be issued under this bill would be interchangeable with all the money that is existing now.

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has referred to the fact that $360,000,000 of Federal reserve notes are backed up by obligations of the Government. Is there not also $600,000,000 of our currency backed up by debts of private citizens and corporations designated as eligible paper?

Mr. BUSBY. That is also true and that represents the paper that is back of the issues of Federal reserve notes on the requirement of 40 per cent gold and 60 per cent eligible paper.

I would like to proceed and give you this further picture. The trouble with this country is not that the currency is not sound. No currency is sound unless the Government income be sound. We have been striving to balance the Budget and we may balance it in the light of present conditions, but you may balance it to-day and if the income of the people dries up, as it is drying up now, if farm commodity prices go down, as they are at the rate of about one-half of 1 per cent a week, a month from now you will have a condition where the Budget is not balanced. Why? Because income for the people is necessary in order to collect taxes; and if you can not collect taxes, you can not keep your Budget balanced, no matter what kind of law is passed.

Last year we had a surplus and this year we found that under the same laws we were not getting enough income. So we tightened them up and we say we will balance the Budget under present conditions, but if you create a condition where the income and the revenue and the earnings of the people are much worse, you create a condition that will unbalance the Budget.

So it goes all along the line. I am going to support this proposition because the currency issued under it will be just as sound as any other currency to which I have alluded. It will be more nearly sound than some, because we will be settling a debt that the Government ultimately must pay. We will be settling a debt that we have agreed to pay, and we will also be disposing of the proposition without levying any present taxes, and on the same basis that we originally contemplated.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it not also a fact that our gold reserve will be behind all this money just as it is behind our Federal reserve money?

Mr. BUSBY. We have got a lot more gold than we are using for monetary purposes, and the Federal Reserve Board will tell you so. The economists in the departments of the Government will tell you there is a lot of gold in this country that is just a "back log" for credit. It is in reserve. It is not being used for monetary purposes, and this is one reason why we have a scarcity of gold in the world. The United States and France have three-fourths of the world's monetary gold supply, and they do not need it for present use

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MANLOVE. I would like to ask the gentleman how he expects the public to buy these 3½ per cent bonds at their face value when yesterday our 3⅜ per cent bonds were selling at 82?

Mr. BUSBY. I will explain that by telling the gentleman that the consols that bear 2 per cent and are eligible for national-bank note issues are worth to-day 101½.

Mr. MANLOVE. Yes; but these bonds, which would carry only one-eighth more in percentage of interest, are selling at 82 cents on the dollar.

Mr. BUSBY. I can not help that. The others are not. If these bonds have the national-bank-note-issuing privilege they will bring par and more. They will also enable the national banks to issue $2,000,000,000 national-bank note currency based on them if sold to these banks. That will help expand the currency in a sound way, just as all national-bank notes are issued now under the law.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman says that these bonds depend upon the soundness of the finances of the Government.

Mr. BUSBY. No; upon the soundness of the income of the American people, just like the Government depends on the same thing—the soundness of the income of the people.

Mr. WHITE. Did not the gentleman say that the soundness of the money of the Government depends upon the Budget?

Mr. BUSBY. No; I did not say anything that sounded like that.

Mr. WHITE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if I misunderstood him.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman tell us specifically what gold, if any, there will be behind these Treasury notes? The gentleman has referred to the Federal reserve notes and the Treasury notes.

Mr. BUSBY. If the gentleman will read the March number of the Federal Reserve Bulletin, it will tell the gentleman how they can issue $3,500,000,000 of additional currency and not lower the amount of gold below the 40 per cent.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman is not distinguishing between Federal reserve notes and Treasury notes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The bonds to which the gentleman from Missouri referred would not be sold until prosperity returned and the country returned to the normal, then they would be sold if there was a tendency to unduly inflate.

Mr. BUSBY. I think the proposition is sound and that we should support it.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the Ragon amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, at the end of line 15, start a new paragraph and insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon the application of the mortgagor of farm real estate, pay off any farm mortgage, including the face value and accrued interest thereon, which mortgage represents not less than 70 per cent of the fair value of the mortgaged land at the time the mortgage was executed. The Secretary of the Treasury shall take in lieu of such mortgage a new mortgage in like amount of principal and accrued interest from the owner of the land, which mortgage bears interest at the rate of 3½ per cent."

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McGUGIN. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may have five minutes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who is so solicitous about the plight of the farmer, made the motion against my amendment, which would have given relief to the mortgaged farm property. I am exceedingly sorry that he would not permit my amendment to be read in full. The amendment which I offered is nothing less than the Frazier bill over in the Senate. If you want to do something for agriculture, directly through the farmer, then permit the mortgages to be taken up and bonds issued against them and, in turn, currency issued against the bonds, as you are now advocating for the issuing of bonds to pay the soldiers' bonus, more than $1,000,000,000 of which is for twelve and one-half years of unaccrued interest.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am not insisting that it is sound to use bonds of the United States as a basis for the issuance of currency for the purpose of taking care of a given class of people. But if the argument is sound that the currency of the United States may be backed by property, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] says, then I insist that it is proper to use this means in coming to the aid of agriculture, which is being foreclosed and sold by the sheriffs.

Now, then, what is more sound than the real estate of this country? If we want to go into an arrangement of issuing money and circulating it, I submit that the Frazier bill is as sound a plan as the one you have here for consideration. The Frazier bill would do for the farmers of this country, who are daily going deeper and deeper into bankruptcy trying to produce food and clothing to sustain the human race, what you are here doing for the holders of bonus certificates.

Another thing, the idea that the United States Government can by magic print money and circulate it for only one class of people without doing it for other classes of people in this country is a fallacy. There are the farmers and the unemployed and dozens of other classes that need assistance.

Let me say this: The real spokesman for this measure, not a Member of the House, stated before the Ways and Means Committee, when that committee was considering this bill, that two and a half billion dollars is not enough inflation. I refer to General Coxey, foremost advocate of printed money. General Coxey said to the committee that the country needs $26,000,000,000 of currency.

You may not like it, but I want to say that if you pass this bill and convert the American people to the Coxey theory of printed currency, without regard to the metallic base, you are not coming back to Congress next December and deny to agriculture and the distressed unemployed the blessings of your magic formula of just printing the currency. If this bill is enacted into law, then the great plunge is made into unlimited inflation by the starting of the printing presses. May we stop somewhere short of where Germany went.

Of course, the Members of this House fully understand that many of those who are now so eloquently pleading for this bill in order to inflate the currency and assist agriculture are only trying to provide an excuse for their votes on this bill. Many of those who are now advocating the passage of this bill on the theory that it will help agriculture have in this session of Congress been advocating full payment of the bonus by the placing of a direct obligation upon the people in the form of bonds or direct taxation. They turned to this magic plan of printing money when they found that the Treasury was so hopelessly insolvent that it was utterly impossible to place a tax burden of $2,400,000,000 upon the people of this country without starting a tax rebellion. This bill, when it was first introduced, did not carry any provision for inflation of the currency in order to help the farmer. The change to the plan for inflation came after it was found that it was necessary to increase the taxes a billion dollars in order to meet the present current expenses of the Government.

Paying the bonus by printing the money makes a soft feather bed to land upon and justify a vote for this bill. It is a fine appeal to the soldier who wants his money, and it furnishes the appeal to the farmer that this inflation of money will increase his commodity prices.

The rejection of my amendment which would extend to the farmer who is losing his home by mortgage foreclosure the same kind of relief as is provided in this bill, shows conclusively that this appeal which we hear from Members for the inflation of the currency in order to help the farmer is merely the excuse and not the reason for supporting this bill. If inflation to help the farmer were the reason for supporting this bill, then why not give the farmer the direct benefit of inflation? Is the farmer so sick and weak that he can not stand direct relief and can only be given indirect relief? Since when will inflation indirectly administered provide greater relief for agriculture than inflation directly administered? [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRIFFIN: At the end of the pending amendment insert the following new section:

"SEC. 3. The amount raised as provided herein shall be paid in monthly installments of $30 per month; and

"Further provided, That no part of said moneys shall be paid to veterans in the following classes, or so long as they remain in said classes:

"(a) Those who have not availed themselves of the privilege of borrowing up to one-half of the face of their adjusted-service certificates under the act of February 27, 1931.

"(b) Those who are cared for in soldiers' homes.

"(c) Those who are now drawing disability compensation in excess of $40 per month.

"(d) Those who are engaged in regular gainful employment.

"Further provided, That on the amounts heretofore borrowed or hereafter borrowed pursuant to this act the interest charge shall be reduced to 2 per cent per annum.

"Further provided, That only the amount necessary to comply with the provisions of this section shall be raised, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore or hereinafter provided."

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment and move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman's amendment that it is not germane to the amendment which I submitted.

Mr. BROWNING. And it further provides the limitation of interest which was not considered at all in the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is germane, because it merely extends the details in reference to the methods of payment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, as a veteran myself I am naturally sympathetic toward any proposal for the welfare of the veterans. I managed on the floor of this House the first hospitalization bill for the benefit of the veterans in 1919. Thousands of them and their families in my district owe the compensation they are now receiving to my efforts. I voted for the bonus, for disabled soldiers' compensation, and for every measure for their benefit up to this good hour. In the very nature of things I could not feel any hostility toward them, and would welcome an honest, straightforward measure for the relief of those in distress.

It can not be denied that I have shown fair play. I voted to discharge the Rules Committee, and I voted for the resolution to take up the consideration of this bill, because I believe its advocates should have a fair hearing. But to pass it in its present shape is utterly unthinkable. That is the reason I have proposed these amendments. I submit that it must be some extraordinary exigency which would require this Government to depart from the well-established custom, and from the rules of law and of common sense, to pay a note before it is due. The adjusted-compensation certificates were granted to the soldiers and sailors upon the distinct understanding that they would wait until 1945 for the payment. I voted for it with the idea that it was a nest egg to be laid aside for these men and women for the benefit of their families. Last year a proposal came up to allow them to borrow one-half, and many of them did borrow one-half. The proposal now is to let them take the balance before it is due, before the accumulated redemption moneys are sufficient to meet the demand. The proponents of the Patman bill are now arguing that the bond issue provided in the Ragon amendment, embodying the Owen idea, is going to better the economic conditions which now distress us. They have gotten us into a maze of complications on financial problems which are all beside the question.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman from New York feel that the substitution of a new bond issue for the same amount, deferring it for an additional seven years, would impair in any way the stability and soundness of the Treasury of the United States?

IF THE MONEY IS PAID IT SHOULD BE PAID TO THOSE WHO NEED IT

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not; but I maintain that if it is our intention to help the veterans who are actually in need, we should do so directly and not use them and their necessities as a stalking horse to exploit fanciful notions of political economy.

I want this money which is to be raised to go to those ex-service men and women who are actually in distress and who are in dire need. I do not see why we should make a present of hundreds of millions of dollars to those who are holding good jobs in the Government service—national, State, county, and municipal. Nor should this money go to those who are actually employed in other gainful employment. This is the reason why I propose this amendment.

Please study these uncontradicted facts: There were 4,200,000 ex-service men and women entitled to receive adjusted-service certificates. Actually only 3,539,937 applied and received their certificates. Six hundred and sixty thousand, who were eligible for the adjusted-service certificates, did not apply for them. Why? Because they did not want them.

There are hundreds of thousands of ex-service men and women now employed in various branches of the Federal and State Governments. They certainly are not in need of the relief proposed in this bill.

Then there are those engaged in gainful employment with corporations and in other avenues of employment. In addition to those there are 700,000 who are now drawing veterans' compensation under the compensation laws. My amendment excludes all of those who are drawing in excess of $40 a month.

My amendment also proposes to prevent those being taken care of in soldiers' homes from depleting their adjusted-service certificates at this time. They are not in need of and have not asked for this gratuity. Most of them, I am satisfied, would prefer to keep their certificates intact so as to have something worth while to fall back upon in case of need.

REDUCTION OF INTEREST FROM 4½ PER CENT TO 2 PER CENT

My amendment also would reduce the interest on all loans heretofore or hereafter made from 4½ to 2 per cent per annum.

If my proposed new section to the Ragon amendment is adopted, it will limit the benefits of the act to those who actually need relief. It will save a billion dollars and enlarge by so much the resources of the Government to render relief to the 8,000,000 men and women in our country who are, through no fault of their own, now out of work and in dire distress. It is a sound enough principle that veterans should come first in our hearts, but it does not lie with a good grace in the hearts of good soldiers to run first to the boats when the good ship of state is in distress.

Under the Patman bill we are asked, practically, to pick out 10 per cent of the unemployed and give them this gratuity that is not due and will not be due until 1945.

Even though the face value of these certificates were now due, this is the least auspicious time for patriotic veterans to make their demand, when it ought to be plain that it can not be satisfied without impairing the resources and diminishing the opportunity of the Nation to render help to the other 90 per cent of the unemployed men and women in our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I desire to support the Griffin amendment. Will the remainder of the time on this amendment be used for the discussion of the Griffin amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending. Gentlemen who are recognized may use their own judgment as to what they will discuss.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it necessary for me to call attention to the apathy that exists throughout this Nation. That subject has been discussed here during the consideration of this legislation, and it is generally understood and agreed that there is need for an expansion of the currency.

The passage of this bill will bring about the only fair distribution of Government funds that have been provided for during this session, and at the same time the method employed will not in any way affect the credit of the Nation. Everyone knows that the purchasing value of the dollar is at present out of line with actual conditions and that prosperity can not be restored until there is a proper inflation of the currency. This distribution of money will immediately go into every section of the Nation, thereby directly or indirectly benefiting every citizen and industry. I regret exceedingly that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury are opposed to this payment. It would seem to me that after having sponsored a number of bills for the purpose of rejuvenating the big industries that at least they could support one measure that would result beneficially to those who are now walking the streets hunting a job, and at the same time reflect a healthy condition throughout the Nation.

I have been told that the outstanding amount of money that is available is something like $55,000,000,000, and that at present only $46,000,000,000 can be accounted for. That being true, it means that $9,000,000,000 is at the present time in hiding. In other words, $1 out of every $6 can not be accounted for. That brings about a situation that is most appalling from the standpoint of business. It does seem to me that after this measure has been properly brought to the attention of the House, and it has been shown that our gold reserve is sufficient to take care of the amount of money needed to pay the ex-service men without in any way interfering with our present financial condition, we should not hesitate any longer in the passage of this bill. This morning in front of the Capitol I saw the Oklahoma contingent composed of about 170 men. They were lined up in military formation, and they were maintaining the regulations as fine as any company of regular soldiers.

A few days ago I visited the camp down on the Anacostia River. There I saw these men using their own ingenuity to build some kind of a little hovel in order that they might be sheltered at night from the elements. On that same day

I happened to attend a picture show, and as a part of the program there was put on the screen a picture of General Harbord. He made a statement similar to that which he is making all through this Nation against this particular legislation. He called attention to the conditions that existed during the Revolutionary War period, and said that the soldiers of the Revolutionary Army came before our Congress at Philadelphia and that afterwards they called upon the United States Army to run them out of the city, indicating that that would be the plan he would follow if it were necessary to move these ex-service men. I resented the attitude that he assumed when he called upon citizens to do their duty. I know that he is receiving a bonus for service performed in the way of retirement pay equal to about $600 per month. I know that some of the officers who are opposed to this particular legislation did not even get close enough to the battle front to smell powder during the World War. I say to you that these boys have conducted themselves in a most honorable manner. In no way have they been accused of doing that which they are not entitled to do. I say that they have a right to come to Washington and to maintain the attitude they are now assuming, just the same as any other citizen, and as long as they continue in that capacity I am going to support this legislation and support them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate the interest of the Federal Government, from the standpoint of its credit, has not been discussed. Members of the House will recall that their mail is burdened with demands from their districts that Federal expenditures be materially reduced and that Federal taxes be diminished. The country is suffering from stagnation in business. Credit is not obtainable. The credit of the United States is below par. Its bonds are selling below par. Those that are already issued show various depreciations.

We now come to the place where we are to decide between the payment of obligations not yet due to a portion of the citizens of the United States, on the one hand, and the benefit of the whole people and all of the unemployed and also the restoration of prosperity, on the other. In these remarks I am not inferring anything against the worthiness of the veterans or their families who will be immediately benefited.

Unusual appropriations and the decline in business in the United States, which resulted in a decrease in Federal revenues has created a serious situation which demands a drastic remedy—that is, reduction in expenditures and the creation of no additional indebtedness.

Let me call attention to a few figures. The United States will close its books this year on June 30 with a deficit of some $2,900,000,000 for the current year. We face a deficit, estimated at the beginning of this session of Congress at $1,241,000,000, for next year. We have endeavored to obviate that difficulty and eliminate that deficit by enacting a new revenue law which will bear heavily upon the people of the United States.

Mr. KUNZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I regret that I can not yield now.

That tax bill will lay a further burden on the revival of industry; but it was thought better to balance the Budget and restore Federal credit, and with it all credit, and then build up, than to continue indefinitely to increase the indebtedness of the United States.

We are now asked to practically undo all the great work that has been done at this session. That is, instead of going into next year with a balanced Budget, and in the years succeeding, we are placing burdens upon the country and upon the Treasury that will cause an unbalanced Budget and leave the credit of the United States in doubt. This $2,400,000,000, if funded into bonds as intended, will add a burden on the Treasury of $84,000,000 in yearly interest at the rate provided in the bill. This additional yearly interest of $84,000,000 would aggregate in the next 12 years over $1,000,000,000, and will be that much in addition to the cost of the adjusted-service certificates, that much more than the Government promised and intended to pay.

There is another bonus bill pending for an immediate payment of $100,000,000, which will probably be brought up and passed. The House has already passed an appropriation bill adding $132,500,000 for roads. The House passed a relief bill estimated to cost $2,200,000,000. Of this amount, say only $600,000,000 is expended in the next fiscal year. It is true that the relief expenditures are to be made under the direction of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the sale of its debentures, which are, however, guaranteed by the United States; but taking into consideration only the deficit of this year, the payment of the bonus, and the road appropriation, we have an aggregate of $5,432,500,000, for which we have had and have now no means of payment except by borrowing upon the credit of the United States—$5,432,500,000 for which we have no money to pay. The $1,241,000,000 of new taxation is to offset the deficit anticipated for the fiscal year of 1932–33, and not that created by the legislation which we are now considering and other legislation adding new expenditures.

Who can believe that so enormous an excess of expenditures over revenues can result otherwise than in disaster to our financial structure, public and private, and in retarding the economic recovery. The country is demanding the opportunity to effect its rehabilitation. Our friends, the veterans, will be more greatly benefited by employment continuing in character than by any other measure, and this has the added factor that all others unemployed will participate.

Because we have maintained our financial integrity thus far, the United States has been regarded as the safest place in which to keep moneys. The nationals of other countries have on deposit here great sums, and also leave here their earnings from various sources. Investment in United States securities have been regarded as the safest method in which such funds could be preserved from loss. For this reason, the Treasury has been able to obtain very favorable rates of interest on its offerings. If now we impair the public confidence in the Federal Government, funds owned abroad will be withdrawn and our gold stocks depleted. I do not need to comment upon the adverse effect of such action. The great question before us now and on which we will shortly vote, is the maintenance of the public credit and the fortunes of the American people as an entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS] for two minutes.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. PARSONS. I do not, if it comes out of my time. I hope the gentleman can get time after I close, for I only have a few minutes.

Mr. Chairman, is this proposition sound, or is it not? That is the only question at issue here.

The bill we approved on February 27, 1932, known as the Glass-Steagall bill, reads as follows:

When any member bank—

Speaking of the Federal reserve system—

having a capital of not exceeding $5,000,000, has no further eligible and acceptable assets available to enable it to obtain adequate credit accommodations through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank * * * the Federal Reserve Board may make advances to such member bank on its time or demand promissory notes secured to the satisfaction of such Federal reserve bank.

When it has no eligible security to give, the Federal reserve system is authorized to take their promissory notes, and issue currency to the bank, applying therefor, on the same identical principle involved in this bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates, if not, the exact routine of operation. Observe the language in the Glass-Steagall bill:

Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or gold or gold certificates.

Not "and" certificates, but or gold or gold certificates.

Provided, however, That until March 3, 1933, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer, and the Federal reserve agents to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States.

We have passed legislation in the language quoted above. The banks, including the Federal reserve system, were selected as a favored class and permitted, even though they had no paper eligible for discount in the Federal reserve system, to give their promissory notes, which was nothing more than a promise to pay to the Federal Reserve Board. On this promise to pay, the Federal Reserve Board is empowered to place eligible securities or gold or gold certificates with the United States Treasury and receive in return therefor Federal reserve bank notes. Furthemore, the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to place with the Federal Treasury Government bonds and receive in return therefor currency issued against the credit of the United States Government to loan to the banks.

What this bill proposes to do is to have the veteran surrender his adjusted-service certificate, a nonnegotiable instrument, and the United States will issue bonds drawing 3½ per cent interest which the Federal Reserve Board can buy with the adjusted-service certificates collected in their hands. The Federal Reserve Board will then place these bonds to the credit of the United States Treasury, and the Treasury will issue therefor the bank currency, just as the Federal Reserve Board is now empowered to do for the banks of the country. It is a reflation or expansion of the currency, but it is controlled by the limitations in amount and the machinery set up for the carrying out of the act. The only difference that any Member of this House can make in the two propositions is: In the Glass-Steagall bill you are legislating for 20,000 banks and perhaps 100,000 bankers, but in the bill under consideration to-day you are legislating directly for the benefit of nearly 4,000,000 veterans of the World War, and indirectly for all the banks, their depositors, the business man, the professional man, and general relief for the entire American people.

There is actually in circulation to-day less than a billion dollars in currency and coin. Credit upon which volume of business is based is utterly destroyed. There can be no recovery from the present dilemma in which we find ourselves unless there is an expansion of the medium of exchange, making it plentiful enough to initiate the exchange of commodities upon a higher price level. This bill, if enacted into law, under the safeguards which have been provided, will place in circulation $2,400,000,000 in new currency, backed by the credit of the United States Government the same as every other piece of currency is backed, and it will be scattered into every nook and corner of the country according to our military population. It will go immediately into the arteries of trade and commerce, paying debts, buying the necessities of life, and I predict that within one 12-month period this issue of currency will enable the American people to wipe out $20,000,000,000 of indebtedness. The appropriations providing for retirement of the veterans' adjusted service certificates of $112,000,000 annually will serve as a sinking fund to retire the currency, the last dollar of which will be called in January 1, 1945, the date set for the retirement of all adjusted-service certificates. This is an extra safeguard and answers fully the question of the opponents who brand this issue as fiat money.

A further safeguard against an undue inflation or expansion of the currency is provided in section 2 of this bill, which says, in substance: That the bonds issued shall not be placed upon the market until such time as the revival of business conditions and commodity prices justify the absorption of the bonds. Under this arrangement not one single dollar of additional burden is added to the Treasury of the United States until a revival of business is obtained. Upon such a predication revenues sufficient to operate the cost of Government will pour into the Treasury. As I stated in the beginning, the same identical proposition contained in the Glass-Steagall bill is the principle involved in this bill. I submit that no man who voted for the Glass-Steagall bill can defend his action in voting against this bill to-day.

Mr. McFADDEN and Mr. CELLER rose.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has a substitute amendment that he desires to offer. The Chair feels the gentleman is entitled to recognition for the three remaining minutes.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN: Page 4, strike out beginning with line 20 through line 4 on page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "bonds of the United States or by check, as the veteran may designate in his application. In case the veteran designates payment in bonds and the amount of the face value of the certificate after the deductions, if any, made under subsection (c) of section 509, as amended, is not a multiple of the face amount of the bond of the lowest denomination issued (with the result that the entire amount can not be paid in bonds), any fractional amount shall be paid by check. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this paragraph.

"For the purpose of making such payments in bonds and to provide funds for payment by check, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue bonds of the United States in such amounts as he may deem necessary. The provisions (except the limitation on the rate of interest) of the second and third paragraphs of the first section of the second Liberty bond act, as amended and supplemented, shall apply to bonds issued under this section, and such bonds shall be exempt both as to principal and interest from taxation to the same extent as bonds issued under the first section of such act, as amended and supplemented. For the purpose of retiring bonds issued under this section, the sinking-fund provisions of section 6 of the Victory Liberty loan act, as amended and supplemented, shall apply to the bonds issued under this section in the same manner as the provisions of such section 6 apply to bonds issued under the first section of the second Liberty bond act, as amended and supplemented.

"SEC. 3. This act may be cited as the 'emergency adjusted compensation payment and refunding act, 1932.'"

Amend the title to read as follows: "A bill to provide for the immediate payment and refunding of adjusted-service certificates, and for other purposes."

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this proposal of paying the adjusted-compensation does not increase the public debt. It is just as much a part of the public debt as any outstanding Government bond to-day. The soldiers now hold the obligation of the United States.

My amendment would treat the settlement of this obligation as a refunding operation just the same as the Treasury carries on its present refunding operations. The only difference between this proposal and the regular refunding operations is that we are anticipating the payment of an obligation which does not mature until 1945.

The proponents of this legislation point out an emergency, and it seems to me that an emergency does exist so far as the ones who are to be benefited by this particular legislation are concerned. That was pretty well established a year ago, when we provided loans to these soldiers to help them in that emergency because of unemployment and hardship.

I am leaving the whole question of rate and terms on the bonds to be issued to the Treasury; I am leaving for them to fix the date of maturity and the rate of interest. So that these new refunding bonds will fit into the Treasury plan in dealing with the entire public debt. I am giving the soldiers the option of holding their present adjusted certificate or of taking in lieu thereof a Government bond or the cash.

I am not in accord with the proposal to issue money. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] pointed out to you that which I believe was perfectly clear, that the issuance of $2,400,000,000 of currency, or, as was stated this morning, increasing our circulating medium 45 per cent, will affect the value of the dollar and the purchasing power of the dollar. That is pretty well established. That is what I am trying to avoid. I want to make this a refunding operation pure and simple. At a time like this I think we are justified in taking from the class of our people who are the least able to pay the burden of carrying this particular amount of the public debt and letting those people who are the best able to pay, the investors, carry this burden. [Applause.] Particularly so when we are and will be giving them—the investors—the best security in the world—a Government bond.

Even though this House may not accept my amendment to this bill, I hope that the other body will accept it.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane, because the bill provides for payment in currency, whereas the amendment, as I understand it, provides for payment in bonds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it is a refunding plan.

Mr. BROWNING. Further than that, it is a refunding proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to overrule the point of order.

The Chair suggests the amendment is not in order at this time, because section 3 has not been read. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to perfect section 3.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed under the order of the House has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand the amendment now under consideration is a new section, section 3. It has been offered as a new section. The order of the House was to limit debate on section 2.

Mr. RAGON. And all amendments thereto.

Mr. STAFFORD. And all amendments thereto. I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, if it is a new section.

Mr. RAGON. It is not a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, as indicated by the gentleman from New York and by the Parliamentarian, is offered as an amendment to the pending amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 80, noes 110.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 161, noes 79.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. This act may be cited as the "Emergency adjusted compensation act, 1932."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "1932."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield to me, in order that I may make a motion?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The motion is not in order at this time, there having been no debate on the section.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, we have heard the financial aspects of this situation thoroughly discussed to-day and during the previous weeks before we brought up this bill. There are one or two points on which I want to touch before we vote.

We have heard different Members of Congress talk about this not being a debt that was due now by the Government; that it is only going to affect a class in the United States. Well, you only need to use a little common sense and decide that almost every service man in the United States has a family. The great majority of the ex-service men have fathers, mothers, sisters, and brothers and are married and have children; so if you will multiply 4,000,000 men by six or seven you will have 24,000,000 or 28,000,000 people who are directly affected financially by the passage of this bill. Furthermore, the funds put in the hands of the ex-service men and their families are going to be handed on to the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, and thereby affect financially the entire population of the United States.

You did not ask when you gave a bonus to the railroads at the end of the war whether the debt was due then. You gave it to them. When you gave these refunds of millions and millions of dollars to the railroads and big corporations of the United States you did not worry then as to whether the money was due, but you just handed it back to them. This money is really due to-day if we go back to 1917 when the men earned it. When you give a man an average of $1,000 you can not attempt to adjust his compensation. You are not adjusting his compensation, but you are only giving him a little bit of money to repay him for what he lost in a monetary way when he went to France and fought on the field of battle for his country.

Now, this is something which we believe is going to bring back prosperity. You say this is only for a class when you know as well as I know that you are going to pass a relief plan before you adjourn this Congress. You are going to pass either the Garner bill, the Wagner bill, or some substitute proposed by the President of the United States. You are going to give relief to the people of the United States before you go home. If you pass a measure providing relief for all the people of the country and pass this soldiers' bonus, you will take care of the prosperity of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, a misapprehension, through the press and circular letters, has gone out through the country in reference to the way this bonus is proposed to be paid. In opposition to the full cash payment of the bonus at this time, it is being stated that $2,000,000,000 in bonds will be issued which will draw large rates of interest and increase the taxes on an already burdened people. If this were true, and other conditions as they are now, as much as I have always been in favor of a cash bonus for the soldiers, I could not support this bill. But this is not true, and anyone who has examined the bill knows that if we pass this bonus bill that it will not cost the Government or increase the liability of the Government one cent, but will save in taxes $112,000,000 each year, which is being set aside for the purpose of paying the adjusted-service certificates.

Most people say that they would be willing for the Government to pay this bonus off at the present time if the Government were in position to do so. There is no one in this House who believes in economy of government more than

I do and who has consistently voted to reduce appropriations, consolidate departments, and reduce salaries, so as to relieve the people.

Then the question arises, How are we to pay this bonus without cost? Of course, the Members of this House who have studied this bill are familiar with our plan. This bill provides that Government bonds shall be issued and placed in the Federal reserve banks and held by them as agents for the United States Government; that Treasury notes which are backed by all the gold and credit of this Nation shall be issued in payment of these notes; that these bonds shall be held by the Federal reserve banks and not sold unless the commodity prices reach within 2 per cent of the common level of 1926, at which time the Federal Reserve Board shall be authorized to sell so many of said bonds as is necessary to stabilize the dollar at that value, and the bonds will not draw interest until they are sold. This will be an absolute safeguard against any possibility of undue or harmful inflation. This is the plan of ex-Senator Owen, who was chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate for eight years, and during which time the Federal reserve act was passed. It has been indorsed by many of the leading economists of the country as thoroughly sound and sane.

My purpose in supporting this bill is not alone in the interest of the soldiers, but because I feel that the issuing of this money will be of great service in bringing back this country to prosperity. It will not only not cost the people anything extra in taxes, but by being made prosperous again, it will enable them to pay what they owe.

This Congress has passed during this session the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, with an expansion of credit to the amount of $2,000,000,000, for the purpose of stabilizing banks, railroads, and insurance companies. It has passed what is known as the Glass-Steagall bill, giving banks the right to take their Government bonds to the Federal Reserve Board and with a small rate of interest receive therefrom the full face value of their bonds in currency, and at the same time the interest on the Government bonds is paid to them. It has also passed an appropriation of $125,000,000 to aid the farm-land banks, to enable the farm-land banks to carry the loans of the farmers. The House has also passed what is known as the Goldsborough bill, which has for its purpose that the Federal Reserve Board shall buy Government bonds and issue currency thereon, until the commodity price level reaches that of 1926. All of these bills are on the idea of the expansion of the currency and making money cheaper, but this money issued, to a great extent, has found its way into the vaults of the big bankers. If this money is issued in payment of these bonus certificates, it will go to the people throughout this country, in every nook and corner, and the people will receive the benefit. If we ever restore prosperity, in my opinion, it must commence at the bottom with the producing class, and the theory of this bill, which we are supporting, will come nearer doing that than any other legislation that has been advocated.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that motion. I move that debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 23, noes 180.

So the amendment to the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments under the rule the committee rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, pursuant to House Resolution 220, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill to final passage.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRISP and Mr. HAWLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 211, nays 176, answered "present" 3, not voting 40, as follows:

Until further notice:

Mr. Nelson of Missouri with Mr. William E. Hull.
Mr. Drane with Mr. Tinkham.
Mr. Brand of Georgia with Mr. Leavitt.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANSLEY, is not recorded. On last night, under the impression I would leave this morning to attend the funeral of my friend and colleague, Mr. Eslick, I agreed to pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I voted "aye." If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANSLEY, were present, he would vote "no." I therefore withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my vote of "aye," as I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. NOLAN, and desire to answer "present."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state for the RECORD that my colleague the gentleman from New York, Mr. BOYLAN, who is ill in a hospital in New York, if present, would vote "aye."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. ROGERS, is unable to be present. He asked me to state that if he were present he would vote "aye."

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, Mr. HASTINGS. If present, he would vote "aye." He is paired with the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. CHRISTGAU, has requested me to announce that he is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "aye," and is so paired.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, requested me to announce that if he were present he would vote "no."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MURPHY, is unavoidably absent on account of illness. He requested me to announce that had he been present he would have voted "aye."

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BECK, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, Mr. SNELL, Mr. SANDERS, and Mrs. PRATT, of New York, are all absent in Chicago at the Republican National Convention. They have asked me to announce that if present they would vote "no," and are so paired.

Mr. ERK. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I desire to announce that I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL. If he were present, he would vote "no." I therefore withdraw my vote and ask to be recorded as "present."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, while the vote is being counted, may I announce that immediately after the vote is declared the House will go forward with the consideration of the Federal home loan bank bill?

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. RAGON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, when the House of Representatives a few minutes ago rejected the so-called Patman plan of paying the soldiers' bonus and adopted as a substitute the Owen plan, it so vitally changed and improved the character of that measure that I am willing to give it my approval.

The adoption of the Owen plan, in my opinion, transformed the proposal before the House from an unsound measure to a sound one. It substituted financial security and stability for financial heresy. It served notice on the country that if the bonus is to be paid, it will be paid with sound money, worth 100 cents to every dollar.

I came to the House of Representatives to-day prepared to vote against the Patman bill unless the Owen plan or something that I regarded as equally sound and practical were substituted for the provision in the Patman bill which I believe would have filled the country with fiat money and would have depreciated the value of every dollar in circulation. My opinion evidently was the opinion of the House in respect to "printing-press money," as the House by a large vote has just adopted the sound Owen plan. Freedom of amendment was allowed in the consideration of the bill, and I was very glad to have the opportunity to vote to substitute the Owen plan for the Patman provision.

Under the Owen plan the great Federal reserve system will be the agency of paying off the bonus and it will accomplish the task on the sound basis of Government bonds and under a scheme which will keep the volume of circulation always under control. Wild and uncontrolled inflation, which was the danger of other proposed schemes, is not even possible under the Owen plan.

If the amended bill becomes a law, it will prove a measure of widespread relief to millions of poor people who are unemployed, many of whom are without a crust of bread, through no fault of their own. It will bring to the State of Indiana $59,232,219.87 and to the congressional district which I have the honor to represent the sum of $7,730,561.14.

Mr. Speaker, I have given most careful and conscientious study and thought to the proposal to pay the soldiers' bonus, my purpose being to reach a decision that would be right and without regard to any political considerations whatsoever.

I have had constantly in mind that the soldiers are not the only persons who are suffering in the United States, and that the bonus proposal, if it can be justified at all, must be justified not only as an act of fair dealing toward the soldiers themselves but as a general relief measure.

I was unalterably against the Patman bill to pay the bonus. It proposed to pay the soldiers by turning the printing presses loose. It is unthinkable. When and if the bonus is paid, I want it paid in real dollars. The Nation has acknowledged this debt to the soldiers, and I do not want any debt of the Nation paid in stage money. I do not want it paid in such depreciated currency that when the veteran thinks he is getting a dollar worth 100 cents, he will be getting one worth 50 or 60 or 75 cents. The experience of Germany and other war-burdened countries with printing-press money ought to be object lesson enough to convince us for all time that it is a good thing to leave alone.

Without for a moment impugning the good intentions of my distinguished and able friend, the author of this bill, whose service in this House is outstanding and whose loyalty to the soldiers is perfectly admirable, I am forced to the irresistible conclusion that it would be handing a gold brick to the soldiers, and it would be handing a still larger gold brick to the millions who are not soldiers and would not receive any "bonus money," but who would find that the purchasing power of the dollars they manage to acquire by toil and honest effort would be sadly diminished by this uncontrolled flood of fiat money issued from the printing presses.

As stated, I would not vote for the Patman bill with its financing provision. Any plan to pay the bonus that receives my favorable attention must be a sound one. I do not believe it is possible to devise any plan of payment that would be based on the solid rock of sound finance, that would give to the soldiers 100 cents of value for every dollar, and that would keep the country out of the slough of a depreciated currency, unless it is based on bonds of the United States Government.

The plan of Robert L. Owen is sounder in every respect than the Patman plan. Robert L. Owen was United States Senator from Oklahoma and chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee which drafted and secured the passage of the Federal reserve act. He proposes to put the Federal reserve system back of the bonus payment and to make that system the Government's agency in discharging this acknowledged debt to the soldiers. The Federal reserve system enabled the ship of state to weather the most horrendous war of all time without a quiver, and it may be accepted, I think, as a safe and dependable agency in paying the bonus. Mr. Owen proposes that bonds of the United States Government shall be issued in the amount of the bonus and these bonds shall be turned over to the Federal reserve system, which will issue Federal reserve notes in small denominations suitable for paying the veterans. Under the supervision of the Federal reserve system the veterans will be paid and they will drop out of the picture.

Thereafter the Federal reserve system, keeping in close touch all the while with commodity prices, will have the power and the authority, as the situation from time to time may require, to sell Government bonds and use the proceeds to retire the outstanding currency, its power extending to the point of enabling it to sell all of the bonds in one offering, if deemed advisable. This plan makes the Federal reserve system a stabilizing and governing body to regulate the volume of currency, to keep it at all times within proper bounds, and it is vastly different from the Patman plan of uncontrolled expansion. I have consulted expert officials of the Treasury Department and they tell me the Owen plan is sound. No less distinguished an economist than Prof. Irving Fisher testified and reiterated before the Ways and Means Committee that it is "a perfectly sound method."

The question arises as to whether it is in the interest of the entire Nation that the bonus should be paid at all at this time. If its payment can be justified, its principal justification, as I see it, must be that it is a general relief measure. I have worked and voted to bring about the deepest possible cuts in the cost of government and the elimination of waste. I voted against the bill to appropriate $132,500,000 to construct public roads because I thought it was wasteful. I voted against the so-called Garner bill to construct public buildings in towns above 1,500 inhabitants because I thought it would involve too much waste.

The payment of the bonus would at least have the merit, as I see it, that the money would not be wasted. It would go immediately into the channels of impoverished circulation and its vitalizing effects would reach every nook and corner in the United States. If the money to be paid out would reach only the veterans, and stop there, I would denounce the scheme as inadvisable, but it would immediately begin circulation throughout the entire community in every city, town, and hamlet in America. When John Jones, the veteran, receives his bonus of $300 he will pay $100 to his grocer on his overdue bill, $50 to his doctor, $75 to his landlord, and so on. The grocer in turn will pay the $100 to his coal dealer, the doctor will pay for the suit of clothes he bought last year, and the landlord will pay the carpenter for shingling the roof of his building. The turnover will go on ad infinitum and the whole community will be more or less benefited. It is not a wasteful plan of relief, but one that is almost 100 per cent effective. A furniture storekeeper in an Indiana county-seat town told me the other day that when the first 50 per cent of the bonus was paid it brought about $1,500 worth of business to his store and that the other merchants of the town benefited accordingly.

The adjournment of Congress is only a few days in the offing. Our able Democratic leader, Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, is quoted as having made the sad prediction that there will be "no relief legislation." It will be unfortunate if something is not done by this Congress to bring relief to the men and women in the common walks of life who are unemployed, hungry, and sorely distressed. Fully 70 per cent of the enormous volume of mail that comes to my office is from veterans who plead for help. Many of them say that they and their families are verging on starvation; that they have no asset in the world except the Government's certificate which acknowledges the debt the Nation owes to its defenders as adjusted compensation and they are bitter because they can not get cash on that only asset to relieve their hunger and suffering. It is a perfectly human feeling. My heart goes out in unbounded sympathy to them, but it goes out no less sympathetically to millions of others in similar circumstances who do not even have the single asset of a deferred bonus certificate. Unless payment of the bonus, through the effect of putting money into general circulation, would relieve them, as well as the soldiers, it would not be justified.

I voted to create the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and for the President's other measures which have been helpful in stabilizing business and finance and which have stopped the failure of banks, but these measures have only thawed the top surface and have not so far penetrated down to the starving men, women, and children whose exigent circumstances require immediate relief. Payment of the soldiers' bonus now under a sound plan might afford the immediate relief which the situation imperatively requires and serve as a stop-gap until the normal processes of business and industry can get into swing through the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and a balanced Budget. Then, with the soldiers satisfied, with industry revived, and business again on the move, we can all pull together for better times, which I believe will be sure to come.

Authorities of the Veterans' Administration advise me that payment of the bonus now would save $500,000,000, or half a billion dollars, which is the estimated cost of administering the bonus loans between now and maturity date in 1945. This would be a saving equivalent to almost one-fourth of the amount that would have to be raised to pay the bonus in full. Why would it not be advisable to cut off this enormous personnel and pay the half billion dollars on the debt to the soldiers?

Payment of this bonus under a sound plan would not in any way unbalance the Budget. It is not as if we were creating a new national debt. The debt already exists. It was created in 1924. Under the Owen plan it would simply be transferring the obligation from one form of national indebtedness to another, which should be accomplished without even causing a break in the securities market and without creating any more disturbance than accompanies any ordinary refunding operation of the Treasury Department, and not a cent would be added to the national indebtedness.

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, the propriety of paying the remainder of the bonus at this time, as provided in this bill, may very properly be questioned in view of the condition of our Natonal Treasury and on other grounds upon which reasonable men might honestly differ.

I shall not impute to any Member of this House who may oppose this measure any motive or purpose other than the exercise of his best judgment, actuated by highest patriotism and loftiest sense of duty to the people of the United States.

On the other hand, I resent the insinuations and, in certain instances, the direct charge emanating from some of the distinguished Members who have addressed this House to the effect that those who vote for this bill do so from cowardice and fear of consequences to their own political fortunes.

I wish the Members of this House to understand, and my constituents at home to know, that my support of the Patman bill is my free and spontaneous act, performed as a solemn duty to my country and as an expression on behalf of that country of a gratitude to 4,000,000 or more World War veterans, to whom we owe everything we are to-day and ever hope to be as a nation of the world.

Mr. Speaker, there is a sinister alignment of interests in this country against the payment of the soldiers' bonus. Behind that flimsy veil I see in opposition to the bonus the same Mephistophelean form I beheld skulking in dark intrigue to further in this House the enactment of the sales tax and to defeat the surtaxes; the same ilk which promoted the moratorium and national economy at the expense of underpaid workingmen and workingwomen in the service of our Government—against Federal relief to the starving men, women, and children of our land; against the Garner relief program to rekindle the life of our stagnant industry so that the 12,000,000 of our idle workmen may be reemployed and again become decently self-sustaining.

I see in the offing that same nefarious creature that originated and recently prosecuted against the membership of this Congress a dastardly propaganda of abuse and intimidation and insolence to the majesty of this high and solemn tribunal of the American people in an effort to coerce this Congress to balance the Budget, the unbalancing of which the very forces represented by that creature brought about.

Mr. Speaker, I shall support this measure for the character of the organized enemies it has outside of this House; I shall support this measure because it is the solemn duty of this Nation to pay to those veterans that debt which we have irrevocably acknowledged to be justly owing them.

"Ah," say the opponents, "we have acknowledged this debt, but have not agreed to pay it until 1945, and we will not pay it until 1945 because 'it is so nominated in the bond,'"

I recall the dramatic speech delivered by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] in this House last December in favor of the "Hoover moratorium," in the course of which he pathetically invoked the benign quality of mercy in behalf of our European debtors by quoting the famous speech of Portia in the Merchant of Venice.

I now invoke with equal fervor the same quality of mercy for which this distinguished Member so eloquently appealed in behalf of these foreign nations, who owe their very existence to the valiant services of the beneficiaries of this bonus in their behalf.

In 1945 many of the veterans will not need this gratuity from their Government, for which they so heroically fought and bled on foreign soil and in the furtherance of a foreign cause.

Many of them will not be here in 1945, and upon our consciences will rest the responsibility and the anguish of regret of having permitted in America—bountiful America, with wealth and resources beyond measurement and conception—the wives and the children, the mothers and the fathers of our heroes to starve and beg and to die just because it is "so nominated in the bond."

This country is rich enough and strong enough to take on obligations to the same amount in times of peace that it incurred in time of war. The good order of this Nation—the integrity and the hope of perpetuity of this Nation, the honor and the glory of this Nation—demand that we pay this bonus now, not by way of grace or succor or alms but by way of duty and for the sake of humanity under God.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, the killing of two birds with one stone is a rare accomplishment. In Government, it would be a miracle. However, that opportunity is now present, if Congress will seize upon it and pass the Patman bill with amendments to pay the bonus in cash and in full.

This action at this time would serve this double purpose: First, it would care for the needs of World War veterans in their great hour of need; and, second, serve as an important aid in the promotion of business recovery. These are the two birds I have in mind.

Provision is made in the Patman bill, with Owen amendment, to issue $2,400,000,000 in paper money to pay the bonus. This method of raising the money will obviate any drain upon the Treasury. This sum, added to the currency now in circulation, would aid very materially in restoring confidence and stimulating business.

It would not be hoarded. Instead, it would immediately find its way into the channels of trade. It would serve to drive away doubts and fears, give impetus to business activity, and, finally, give us the victory over depression, which up to this time has successfully challenged the genius of man to conquer it.

This inflation of currency, it is said, would cheapen the dollar, but as it goes down it would meet all commodity prices going up. Manufacturers and farmers would be especially benefited. Farm products have reached such low levels that American farmers are in actual distress. Deflation in prices is a chief source of our present trouble.

The further argument is advanced that inflation of the currency would endanger the gold standard. A recent Treasury statement discloses that we now have $4,000,000,000 in gold. This reserve, according to a very high authority, would permit an increase in currency up to $10,000,000,000, which is now $5,500,000,000, without doing violence to the gold standard. The chief danger to the gold standard, in my judgment, lies in the fact that many countries have abandoned it. This means that it will take more of their dollars to purchase our goods and, therefore, make it more difficult for this country to recover its lost export business.

President Hoover, who is leading the opposition forces to the bonus, is apprehensive that it would "undo every effort to reduce public expenditures and balance the Budget." In my humble judgment, his alarm is not justified and will not be. I have full faith in the ability of the American people to solve their own problems. They always have and always will.

If President Hoover's misgivings should be justified, the necessity for reduced public expenditures would be the more imperative. Necessity itself would force a reduction in public expenditures, which should have been made long ago. Six or seven hundred million dollars could have been saved to the people long ago if needless bureaus, commissions, and boards had been abolished, and some of which are now to be abolished or consolidated. This tremendous saving would in itself pay the bonus and balance the Budget. The chief trouble about balancing the Budget is the fact that no one wants to be taxed.

President Hoover, in his so-called veto message of the bonus bill, made the statement that the American Legion is consistently supporting his position of opposition to the bonus. My information is that 98 per cent of the legionnaires are backing this bill and very urgent in their demand for payment of the bonus in full.

Other objections have been raised to the payment of the bonus. To me they are inconsequential, so that I will not pause to notice them. There is just one question to be determined in this whole matter; that is, whether payment of the bonus in cash and in full at this time would be detrimental to the best interests of the country. A careful survey of the situation convinces me that it would not, but on the contrary would be beneficial to the public welfare, for the reasons I have stated among others.

Reasoning from this standpoint, I think the bonus should be paid. There are two sides, of course. Here is the other side. At this time 750,000 able-bodied veterans are out of work, 75,000 slightly disabled veterans are out of work, and 800,000 veterans are working only one or two days a week. Other thousands are in hospitals of pain. These figures are amazing and depict more effectively and eloquently than words the serious situation of these World War veterans. Their unfortunate situation is no fault of their own. They are the innocent victims of conditions over which they have no control and brought about very largely by ill-advised, costly legislation.

There is much concern about the state of the Union. We have unlimited wealth and unlimited resources. The country is not bankrupt. Patriotism is not dead. American genius will lead us out of it all in due time. Sanity in legislation is what is needed. Lowering of tariff rates and repeal of the eighteenth amendment would instantly restore confidence and produce enough additional revenue to pay the bonus and balance the Budget, or nearly so.

Convinced as I am that passage of the bonus bill would have no ill effect on the country, I am persuaded that it is my duty to support the measure. This I shall do, with conscience approving, which after all, is the safest guide.

Each recurring Armistice Day, the beautiful and impressive ceremony of honoring some "Unknown Soldier," who lies buried in Arlington Cemetery at Washington, is observed. The President of the United States is the spokesman. In words of tenderness and love he voices the sentiments of the people of the country in expressing their reverence for the soldier living and dead. They rendered heroic service, which entitles them to this affectionate regard. Sympathy, of course, should not swerve one from duty to country, but where no injury is done and infinite good is accomplished, its proper exercise is a Christian duty.

I do not and would not ask any Member of Congress to vote for this bonus measure against his honest convictions. However, if upon investigation and a careful analysis of all the facts, it is found that it will not impair the Nation's credit, then in God's name and in fairness and justice of these veterans, vote for this bill. It is an old saying, and in many instances a true one, that nations are ungrateful. We should never permit that to be applied to our own country, which has constantly and consistently led all nations in the matter of fairness and justice, liberty and equality, and the largest measure of freedom to all the people.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, the main contentions of the administration and the Members who are opposed to the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates are that if the certificates are paid it will unbalance the Budget, and that it will be detrimental to business. In the Sixty-ninth Congress, when this adjusted-service certificate act was passed, the Government's income was greater than its expenditures. In the Seventieth Congress we reduced taxes to the extent of $190,000,000. There was no unbalanced Budget then. In both of these sessions there was always opposition to the immediate payment of these certificates—incidentally, I do not understand why the Sixty-ninth Congress considered these certificates "adjusted." From the attitude of some of the Members they should have named it the "injustice" service certificate. If they had done so, some of their arguments to-day would have been justified.

The unbalancing of the Budget began in the Seventy-first Congress. At that time it was the duty of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, to advise Congress of the situation, or they should have submitted some plans toward the balancing of the Budget, but instead the President and the Secretary of the Treasury said nothing to us officially, and immediately upon the adjournment of Congress the country was advised that there was a deficit of $1,000,000,000. In order to make up that deficit the Secretary of the Treasury, besides borrowing on short notes issued $800,000,000 4 per cent long-term bonds. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury knew then that the expenditures of the Government were $1,000,000,000 more than its receipts. Notwithstanding their knowledge of that fact, the President refused to call a special session of Congress in order that we might devise some ways and means of balancing the Budget for the year 1932. But the President, unable to meet the situation, refused to call Congress in special session and again permitted another deficit of approximately $1,200,000,000. Now on the eve of election he expects this House to make up the deficit of $1,200,000,000 and to cut Government expenditures in order to balance the Budget for the year 1933. If the President and the Secretary of the Treasury will issue bonds for the deficit of 1932 as they did for the 1931 deficit, then there would be no question before this Congress about balancing the Budget for 1933.

The Secretary of the Treasury refusing to issue bonds for the 1932 deficit, expects this Congress to make up the deficit of $1,200,000,000, and in addition to that expects it to reduce Government expenditures between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000; he had the Director of the Budget to reduce the Budget about $400,000,000 and Congress further reduced the appropriation approximately $250,000,000, making a total of reductions about $650,000,000. I would suggest that the Government issue bonds to take care of the adjusted-service certificates. These bonds, to run for a period of five years, which could be easily taken care of by repealing the Volstead Act and permitting the States to make beer. The Government has not hesitated to issue bonds for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to take care of the banks and big corporations of the country, and is now ready to issue bonds to increase the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and for the home loan bill, yet it still refuses to advance the payment of these certificates.

I believe the Government could abandon a further increase for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and pay these adjusted-service certificates, which would place cash in the hands of 3,500,000 veterans scattered throughout the country, most of whom are out of employment or unable to earn a living wage at this time. By doing so we would not only help 3,500,000 veterans but you might multiply that figure by five. We would help approximately 17,500,000 people in the United States, about one-seventh of the population. This would permit them to pay their debts and help to stimulate business in the United States.

The President during the World War won the reputation of a "great humanitarian" and took care of the people suffering in Belgium and in the Far East, and I hope that he will exhibit the same feeling toward the veterans of the World War by signing the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the privilege of raising my voice in support of the passage of the pending bill which has for its purpose the payment of the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates held by the veterans of the World War.

The enactment of this legislation will not only provide for the payment of a just debt to these veterans which has already been acknowledged by the Government but will afford the greatest measure of benefit throughout the entire country of anything that has thus far been proposed. It will provide for the payment of this debt to the veterans at a time when most of them need it more than they ever have since the date of the acknowledgment of the debt, and will also afford this measure of relief throughout the country at a time when it is needed more than at any other time in the history of this Nation.

The veterans have based their claim upon the high ground that the passage of this measure will afford relief throughout the entire country and will benefit all classes of our citizens. The World War veterans loved their country enough to fight for it in time of war and they love it enough to live for it in time of peace. They do not base their claim for consideration upon the selfish ground that they alone will be benefited by this legislation.

The money used for the payment of this obligation of the Government will go to every nook and corner of the entire country. The service men went from everywhere that anybody else lived, and at the close of the war they returned to their former homes. As an illustration of the widespread distribution of these funds, I cite the case of my own State of Tennessee. The balance due on these certificates to the veterans of Tennessee, after deducting the amount of loans already made on the certificates, will amount to the sum of $36,108,472.80. The veterans of the counties of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent will receive the following amount: Crockett, $239,554.20; Dyer, $433,389; Gibson, $642,086.40; Haywood, $359,669.40; Lake, $144,706.80; Lauderdale, $323,002.80; Obion, $401,386.80; Tipton, $379,472.40; Weakley, $403,815.60; making a total sum of $3,327,083.40 for these nine counties. This illustration is typical of the situation which will exist throughout the Nation.

The situation presented by the pending bill presents the strongest possible evidence of the fact that no question is ever settled until it is settled right. The adjusted-compensation question has not been settled right; therefore, it still remains unsettled to-day. I have always taken the position that the original optional plan proposed by the American Legion for the settlement of adjusted compensation to the veterans was the fairest and best that has ever been proposed. It afforded the veteran the opportunity of exercising his option as to whether he would receive the cash payment provided for the adjustment of his compensation or would receive a certificate which really amounted to an insurance policy. I entertain the view that if I owe a man a hundred dollars it is my duty to pay him, and I have no right to tell him what he has to do with his money after I pay the debt. I think it was a mistake for the Government to try to assume the rôle of a self-appointed guardian for the veteran and determine the question of the purpose for which money should be used which was acknowledged to be due the veterans. If this original optional plan had been enacted by Congress, I have no doubt that this question would have been settled long ago. The Government adopted a different policy toward the veterans than that adopted for others.

When the veterans returned from the service they were given the sum of $60, which was not enough for them to actually change from the uniform to civilian clothes, based upon the price levels prevailing at that time. The Government gave $240 each to civilian employees, which was paid in cash. The Government then paid some $3,000,000,000 to war contractors in an adjustment of their compensation, and about $2,000,000,000 to the railroads, all of which settlements were made on a cash basis. I submit that in view of this action it was unfair to give the veterans a certificate due 20 years from the date it was issued.

The question has been raised that the debt is not due until 1945. In answer to this I would invite attention to the fact that if the average amount which was acknowledged to be due the veterans, based upon $1 a day for service in this country and $1.25 a day for service overseas, is taken as a basis and the same average amount of interest figured on this amount, from 1918 when the debt was really due, which the veteran has been required to pay on the loan made on his certificate, that it will be shown that the present face value of these certificates would have been due on October 1, 1931.

One of the most important questions involved in the pending bill, and which is presented by the so-called Owen amendment, is that of an expansion of the currency. I have been endeavoring to make some study of this question and I am inclined to believe that this offers the best course to bring about some measure of relief throughout the country. Many of the leading economists of the Nation, including some of the most eminent professors in this subject in the leading colleges and universities, take the very definite position that this kind of action is necessary to afford a measure of relief for the deplorable conditions now existing. I think there can be no doubt that there is too great a difference between the present value of the basic commodities of the country and the present value of money. Of course, agriculture is the basic industry of the Nation and the products of this industry are at such a low level that I can see no hope for much improvement until this price level is raised or the value of money brought down nearer the same level. As an illustration of the point that occurs to me in this connection, let us take for example a few of the basic agricultural commodities and consider the situation presented relative to them.

Let us take the case of the man who contracted a debt when cotton was selling around 18 cents per pound, wheat around $1 per bushel, and corn around 75 cents per bushel, and then consider the condition of this man when cotton is around 6 cents, wheat around 35 cents, and corn around 25 cents, and it can readily be seen that this same man is required to pay the value of 3 pounds of cotton or 3 bushels of wheat or corn for 1 pound or 1 bushel at the time his debt was contracted. Unless there is something done to improve this situation I am at a loss to see how this man will ever be able to pay his debt or any way for business conditions to improve.

The passage of this legislation will not take any money from the Treasury and will not affect adversely the balancing of the Budget. The settlement of this debt at this time on the basis provided in this bill will save the sum of $112,000,000 per year to the Treasury from now until 1945, as this amount is now required to be appropriated each year to meet the necessary sinking-fund requirements.

The question is also raised that the issuance of the additional currency provided for under the Owen plan would not have behind it an adequate gold redemption fund. I submit that this position can not be sustained when the provisions of the act of March 14, 1900, known as the gold standard act, is taken into consideration. It was shown by the officials of the Treasury Department who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee during the hearings held on this bill that while the present amount of 40 per cent gold reserve was required for the issuance of currency that there was actually 71 per cent gold reserve then in existence, and that the issuance of the additional currency contemplated under this plan would only reduce that reserve to about 45 per cent, which would be 5 per cent above the required amount. Some of the leading economists of the Nation, including Dr. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, in appearing before the Ways and Means Committee at the hearing took the very definite position that currency issued under the plan proposed by ex-Senator Owen would be perfectly sound.

Therefore I submit that the passage of this legislation would save to the Treasury Department of the United States the sum of $112,000,000 per year until 1945, would discharge an obligation justly due the veterans, and would provide for a sound method for the expansion of the currency which would be to the benefit of the people throughout the entire country.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, 15 years ago, we were drawn into a great war. One of the belligerents had by illegal means at sea destroyed our children, our women, and our men. Contrary to the laws of nations, it had, against our too patient protests, destroyed our ships and their cargoes. It had sent into our country its agents of subversion, waste, and sabotage. Its attitude toward us was contemptuous. It insulted our flag. Its conduct of the war and its behavior toward others were such as to warrant the belief that, if it were to be successful in Europe, it would attack our own sovereignty.

So we entered the war against it; and when our aid had brought about its end, we had sent to the firing lines a million men, and to support them another million, while we had ready at home 2,000,000 more in case of need. I hold every one of these men in honor, wherever he served.

Now, we find ourselves in another war, a war of a different kind, a war against economic adversity. It was unforeseen and unprepared against by three Republican administrations wholly in control of the Government until last December and still dominating. Since November, 1929, our prosperity has been subnormal, but for 19 months thereafter the need for aggressive measures in combating it was unrecognized. Only the weak, puerile, and inept methods of pacifistic conference and persuasion had been resorted to. But in June, 1931, we were told that we were "fighting in a war on a hundred fronts."

For several months we had been confronted by a great deficit in the Treasury and in that month it was known that it would approximate $900,000,000 for the year. But in that month resort was had to extraconstitutional methods to bring about the postponement of income of a quarter of a billion dollars that would have offset it in part. The deficit has grown and so far this year amounts to $2,700,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, there are a few simple principles of war. One is that "there is a main objective," against which, according to another, "there should be concentration of forces." Dispersion of effort gets nowhere decisively. We are not and never have been properly in a "war on a hundred fronts." Our efforts should be concentrated upon the deficit as the main objective in promotion of the general welfare. We should fight upon a single front.

To overcome a deficit there must be economy on the side of ordinary expenditures, or increase of income on the side of ordinary receipts, or both.

Economy is measured by the ratio of what one gets to what he expends. In many discussions in committee and on the floor, speakers have thought only of the denominator of that fraction.

Increase of income can come only from rising taxes. Taxes of any kind impose a burden upon prosperity.

In the management of budgets, short-time obligations may properly be incurred to bridge temporarily a gap that it is foreseen will soon be filled by current receipts. Long-term bonds are excusable on two grounds, one for the purpose of constructing productive works, the other with the object of providing what will be for the general welfare of future generations. We have no right to mortgage the future of our descendants to make up for our own extravagance or waste.

Thus we are thrown back upon the necessity of imposing economy upon the Government and taxes upon the people. We come back to another war principle, that of "simplicity."

It will be difficult to raise more revenue than is provided by the bill recently enacted into law. So we are left nothing to do but economize. And in the face of that necessity, we are counterattacked by the advocates of the immediate cash retirement of adjusted-service certificates. This is nothing but a raid upon the Treasury. There is no economy in it, for the numerator of our fraction will be zero and the denominator will be $2,400,000,000.

By virtue of my membership in this distinguished body, I have the right to oppose this raid. I believe it to be hostile to the general welfare. By virtue of my service also, I have the right to speak. Most of my life has been spent in support of superior authority and in exercising authority within my own sphere. I commanded the training camp at Leon Springs, Tex., whence we sent 1,500 splendid young emergency officers who helped to distinguish one of our finest divisions of civilian soldiers, the Ninetieth, from Texas and Oklahoma. From Camp Grant, Ill., where I commanded for a time, 200,000 trained soldiers graduated. In France, the unique experience came to me of commanding three different divisions. At all these places we taught, and taught successfully, love of country, respect for constituted authority, submission to privation, fortitude in danger and hardship, forgetfulness of self in loyalty to the higher ideal of the general welfare. We taught officers and men to be simple, thorough, direct, prompt. At all these places, there was no survivor who did not benefit spiritually, morally, mentally, and physically, if he was amenable at all to improvement.

From the origin of the American Legion I have been a member. I belong to one of the great posts—No. 1 of Portland, Oreg. I was on its executive committee.

Last August it was proposed to demand cash payment of the bonus; our State convention at Corvallis disapproved it. Then the national convention of the Legion disapproved it by a decisive vote at Detroit in September. As for all my mature life I have done, I propose now to follow the legally constituted authority; that is, "to refrain from placing unnecessary burdens upon our Governments" and to unite my efforts with those of the well inclined "to the end that the war against depression be victoriously concluded." I shall oppose my endeavors against this raid on the Treasury, this attack on our general welfare, particularly odious because, among its self-constituted leaders are some men who will owe their loyalty to the Legion; some men who, by no stretch of the imagination, experienced any more risk during the war than though they had never volunteered or been drafted; some men who served a little while and were rejected as unfit; some men who appeal to greed in their own personal political interest; some men who resort to fallacies, to arguments over and over disproved for 25 centuries in propagandizing against the general welfare for an evanescent advantage of a special group. There are leaders even who had no part in the World War, who have persuaded legionnaires to desert to a new standard, which should bear the strange device, not "excelsior," but "grab." The Veterans of Foreign Wars saw the opportunity to build upon the hardships of the World War veterans and have conducted what labor circles would call an "outlaw strike," building membership rapidly, as in other periods of adversity, from the disaffected and easily led, prostituting patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, there were a great class that suffered from the war. There were the dependents, relatives, and friends of those who laid down their lives on account of violent injuries on the battlefields, valiant heroes who themselves gave all, and of those who died equally honorably from other accidents, injuries, and disease, at home as well as abroad. There are many thousand of others still suffering from disabilities directly traceable to the war. To all of these I cry the greatest honor and glory. For all of these I bespeak the deepest gratitude, the freest generosity, the most sympathetic help. Our people have given that, are giving it, and will, I am sure, continue to give it, and that policy I shall support.

But I appeal to the able-bodied among the World War veterans to make the good fight against depression just as they would willingly have made the combat against the armed enemy so few years past, animated by the same motives as were effective then, namely, "Duty, Honor, Country." The adjusted-service certificates constituted an honorable and generous settlement. Let the situation remain on its present legal basis. To do otherwise will be certainly to lose the present battle.

Our Treasury is now bankrupt. It is falling behind at the rate of $8,000,000 a day. In Congress there is an earnest effort to reduce outgo and to increase income. Income can not conceivably be increased to provide $2,400,000,000 to pay the bonus. There are only two ways to get the money. One is by borrowing, the least objectionable. This is vicious because the money would not be put into productive enterprise, or into permanent improvements, nor could it soon be repaid. Moreover, it would depress the prices of other bonds and the assets of insurance companies on which so much of the security of our people depends.

Further, it would injure the credit of our Government and tend to increase interest rates for agricultural and other borrowers. And it would add to the tax burden. The other way is by printing money. A few days ago I gave some examples from American history of the disastrous effects of such a policy and later on in this talk I shall say more of it.

But now, let me show what would happen, even if the money were available and even if it were as good as gold.

Two billion dollars worth of goods can not change hands and enter into consumption without loss of wealth, if those who receive it give nothing in return. The demand would be superficial and temporary; and if capacity to produce were rushed to meet it, there would be left a vacuum in business and industry as soon as the rush had gone by. We are suffering to-day from the effect of such a vacuum caused by the last bonus payments.

Men who are employed and receive funds for accomplishment, which directly or indirectly produces wealth or consumes goods, are constant customers and their demand is a continuing one as long as they are employed. Under such circumstances their purchases represent no loss to any individual or to the country, whereas purchases with money which the Government might give to men for doing nothing must be a direct burden upon all the people.

If $2,000,000 worth of goods were taken without payment by the Government from merchants and given to a million men, each merchant would lose 100 per cent of the value of the goods taken from him. If the Government, instead of taking the goods from the merchants without giving them anything in return, gave them promises to pay that they could use to purchase more goods, the loss would be transferred to the Government which gave the promise. It, in turn, must collect it from the people through taxation. Every merchant from whom goods were taken under such circumstances would have to pay his part of the loss, his proportion of the increased taxation necessary.

If the thought in the minds of those who are advocating the payment of currency to veterans in order that they might buy goods is that the use of such paper by the veterans will deplete the stocks of goods in the country so that their replacement will start up business, it would be even more effective for the Government to buy $2,000,000,000 worth of goods from the merchants of the country and destroy them, thus creating not only a vacuum in goods, but still leaving a demand for goods on the part of the veterans which would add to the demand for new production to replace the goods which had been destroyed.

Should the Government undertake any such action, it would have to be paid for by taxing the people and under no different conditions in effect than would be true if it paid men in printed currency to buy the goods. Under the plans that are before the public to pay a bonus to ex-soldiers, their purchases in large part would not mean any depletion of the market, but merely a transfer of the goods from the market to the veterans supplying their natural demand but without the creation of any character of force that would require any greater replacement of goods than would be true if the veterans made their purchases from such normal income as they might command.

Following the war when the soldiers returned to their homes in certain European countries, governments desiring to protect them from unemployment, while industry was holding back for fear that there might be no market, placed the soldiers upon payrolls or upon some income basis that did not require them to give anything in return for what they received.

In Austria, for instance, men were placed upon the Government railroads or in other positions where they could not give a return because their services were not required and could not be utilized. The Government of Austria paid these men with printed currency. There was no thought at the start of developing a progressive depreciation of the currency, which would work toward the ultimate destruction of its value, but once this system was started, it was impossible to stop. The result was that all good money left Austria and the printed money fell rapidly in value day by day until in 1920 the people were brought to the point of starvation. The situation reached such a crisis in the spring of that year that the governments of some of the allied and neutral nations had to supply Austria with food. The whole nation suffered and has really never come out of the depths of the disaster into which it fell because its soldiers were being paid in printed money for doing nothing.

In 1923 in Germany obligations of Government were met with printed currency, which once started also ran into a progressive depreciation of the currency, and that was so rapid that it threw the whole country into turmoil, resulted in great loss of wealth to the nation due to the export of German goods below real values, and in June, 1924, reached a point where there were over a sextillion German marks outstanding. In the reorganization, it took a trillion of these marks to equal one single mark of the former value of 23.8 cents.

There are innumerable cases of inflation of currency to the breaking point furnished by history, but these two which are of such recent date as to be in the minds of all would seem to show the menace of entering upon any such operations.

If $2,000,000,000, or, to be exact, $2,400,000,000, in new currency were issued, it would reduce the reserve percentage in the United States to about 45 per cent, bringing it very close to the legal minimum of 40 per cent. At the same time that we approach this point the free gold would be reduced to something like $500,000,000.

The effect upon the United States of engaging in such tremendous inflation would be actively felt through the withdrawal of foreign funds now in the United States, which would mean an outflow of gold.

We are not required to use our imagination to see that this would happen, for in September and October, 1931, when there was fear abroad that the United States was going to engage in operations that would cause serious inflation there was actually shipped from this country $427,000,000 in gold. These shipments resulted merely from the fear that there might be inflation in this country; and if we enter into any such process, we can confidently expect that over a billion dollars in gold would be withdrawn from the United States, a sum that would be more than double the free gold that might be available.

We have had other evidence in recent weeks of such a certain development through the fall in the value of the American dollar in foreign countries when rumors that we were to undertake inflation spread throughout Europe.

To-day one-fourth of the Budget of the United States Government goes to the payment of veterans. Is it possible that those men who constituted the great American Army in 1917 and 1918 are willing to take part in the economic disruption of our country, or that they are unwilling to do their part with their fellow citizens in trying to stem the tide of the depression?

The ex-soldiers in this country should send their lobby home and should never again allow political or other forces to lead them to strive for further payment from our Government, which means that they are in effect taking from their neighbors something of that which their neighbors labor to earn.

What a wonderful example to the world would be set and what confidence would be created in the United States of America if the ex-soldiers of all of our wars, except the war disabled, would come forward and demand the return of their full American citizenship on a basis of equality with their friends and neighbors and the rising generations, and with the announcement that from this day forward they will work to protect the Treasury of the United States from all of those forces of every character which may operate to unwisely increase the burden of taxation under which our people are laboring.

That is what we would expect from our veterans and that is what they would gladly give if freed from political pressure. May we hope that they will see the light and assert the right. They were a wonderful army. They can still be a wonderful army.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I charge no one in this House with cowardice nor with being influenced by the veterans here in Washington or with the veterans back home. I concede to those in this House their sincerity of purpose in doing what they believe to be for the best interests of their country at a time when, O Lord of Hosts, it needs help.

I voted to bring this measure upon the floor of this House for two reasons. First, that the veterans who served their country in its time of peril and gave of their blood, their time, and strength, not for money, or at best for a mere pittance of money, but for the love of country, are entitled, of all men, to be heard by this body. Second, that I thought when I voted that the bill might be amended in some manner proposed by Mr. KLEBERG, of Texas, or Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. On account of the parliamentary situation, I understand that can not be done, so I am constrained to vote against the bill under consideration with the principles involved.

I am moved to that attitude not because of any lack of feeling for the interests of the veteran nor because the money is not due. Legally, of course, it is not due, but the exigencies of the law in instances should give way to moral consideration. And it seems to me that this is one of the instances providing that the interests of the United States and all the people thereof are not harmed by so doing. No Member of Congress should cast his vote against the interests of the people in the United States except on strict legal grounds. Now, I know that the Members who favor this measure believe that it is in the interests of the people of the United States to vote for the measure and I am not criticizing them. I honor them for their stand. I would do the same thing if I believed as they do. But I do not believe as they do, so it would be dishonor on my part if I voted otherwise than my true and honest convictions. I want in the limited time allotted to me to state the reasons for my belief, first stating, as I said before, that I would have no difficulty in getting over the moral grounds, because many of the veterans are out of employment, they are suffering with almost all of our fellow countrymen, especially the class who labor. All classes are suffering, if not physical then mental suffering, and this goes for Members of Congress as well as those who share the responsibility of government. Without digressing further, let me now state the reasons for my belief.

There is about $11,000,000,000 in gold in all the world. That is all the real money in the world except silver, where silver is used as money. Upon that gold there has been erected a vast superstructure of fiduciary money, government debts credits of every kind and description. The truth is that that superstructure became top-heavy, at least it did so in the minds of men, and we are going through a settling-down process, the evidences of which is depression throughout the world. We do not speak of it as a settling-down process, we call it lack of confidence. Lack of confidence in what, lack of confidence in the ability of the world to pay its debts in the money of ultimate redemption. When the settling-down process has gone far enough, or when men believe that it has, confidence will revive and business will again go on. Is it the way to restore confidence to add at this time more than two billion to this superstructure without adding to the base? I know at once this thought will occur that you are not adding to the superstructure, because you are merely substituting one obligation for another. My answer to that is you are changing the nature of the obligation, you are changing the obligation from one not directly bearing upon this gold to one bearing directly upon this gold.

The obligation now is noninterest bearing and means have been provided for its final liquidation; it therefore rests lightly on gold, whereas under the proposal of this bill you provide for interest-bearing obligations; and while it may be said that the same means be used to liquefy these obligations, yet you are adding the interest charges which will have to be provided by the taxpayers in addition to their already burdensome taxes and to the extent at least of these interest charges you have an additional and direct burden on gold. The interest charge on $2,400,000,000 at 3½ per cent is $84,000,000 annually. You are putting that on the backs of the taxpayers when everybody is howling for reduced taxes, which also means less burden on gold; and when business is stagnant and men are out of employment, when people are being sold out because of high taxes, how can I justify a vote that is going to add more to their burdens and cause a lessening of trade and commerce which are bound to follow these taxes? Instead of putting men to work you are going to throw more men out of work. The veteran will have used his money, which will be but temporary relief, and find himself worse off than now, because these veterans out of work will need work and then little, if any, will be available and they will become public charges unless some further means are found for their relief, which means more taxes and with the added burdens less work, and so on ad infinitum until we are all engulfed in destruction.

Now, you say that you are not going to sell those bonds until prices rise. Let me warn you that until those bonds are sold and a sinking fund provided for the same, including the interest, you are going to have an unbalanced Budget, which will cause more hoarding and drive capital out of the United States, which will cause more unemployment. Now, that is not a rosy picture, but it is possible—yea, probable—and, feeling as I do about its possibilities, I can not vote for the measure, because, according to my way of thinking, it is not for the interest of all the people of the United States, the veteran included.

Now, I have talked about gold and the bearing of this new obligation upon gold, which will retard economic recovery. We here did not make the gold standard. We know it has worked very badly, and the thought of the world is now turned upon it. I for one believe it can be made to work if the world would turn to silver to supplement gold for additional reserves.

In that statement I am not advocating bimetallism with any fixed ratio. I would add silver to the base of gold as a means of supporting the superstructure. I would monetize silver and stabilize it in terms of gold. I would not wait for other nations. I would advocate an American policy with reference to silver and then invite the other nations to join us. I know what I am saying is contrary to the recent findings of the gold council of the League of Nations and many leading economists throughout the world. However, in advocating silver as a supplement to world reserves I am supported by many statesmen, bankers, financiers, and business men of the first rank throughout the world. That is another story. I am injecting it here as food for thought, as a means for reviving business, to cure unemployment, make business profitable, and ultimately to pay the soldiers' bonus and give the soldiers work without endangering the whole governmental and financial structure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the United States Government is admittedly indebted to those who kept the faith of our Nation during the years of 1917 and 1918. These brave men, living and dead, met our most glorious expectations and upheld America's ideals upon foreign soil and returned our flag unsullied and in triumph. To these valiant and intrepid soldiers, sailors, and marines, who fought, bled, and died upon foreign shores, Congress has through appropriate legislation admitted the country's indebtedness.

Upon the convening of Congress at the present session, I introduced a bill providing for the immediate cash payment of the ex-service men's adjusted-service certificates without interest deductions. This bill, as well as those of other Members of Congress seeking relief for the ex-service men, is receiving serious opposition on the part of those who would extend the credit of the United States to the extent of $2,000,000,000 for the purpose of raising money to loan the banks and railroads and so-called big business interests to pay dividends on watered stocks and bonds and to grant moratoriums to foreign nations who are indebted to us to the extent of millions of dollars. It was not expected that bills introduced to pay the debts justly due our Nation's heroes would meet with the approval of the banking houses of Morgan, the Mellons, and other international bankers, nor was it expected to meet with the approval of President Hoover or any of his friends when we take his past record into consideration. It might not be amiss to pause and here pay tribute to President Hoover for his loyalty to the international banking interests, the railroads, and so-called high finance of our country who made his election possible. Regardless of the opposition of the larger interests of the country, the fact remains that we are indebted to our ex-service men approximately $2,000,000,000 (the sum recently appropriated to loan the railroads and banks).

If this money is admittedly due them, now is the time to settle in full. Now is the time to help the masses, the unemployed, the wage earners, the farmer, and the small business men of the Nation. The railroads and banks have been aided by huge appropriations. Foreign nations have been granted extensions of their debts, but our long-suffering common people have either been entirely ignored or forgotten.

If the bill which I have introduced, same being H. R. 8016, is enacted, or the pending bill passed, it will bring about the following results:

First. It will adjust in part the obligations which we owe to those who offered their lives that our country might survive and retain its place and standing among the nations of the earth.

Second. It will increase the actual cash in circulation to an amount almost double that in circulation to-day. This must be done if we are to prosper.

Third. It will help directly our common people, a class who have been sadly neglected and whose interests have been overlooked.

Fourth. It will help directly the farmers, the small stores, wholesalers, factories, and the smaller banks.

Fifth. It will again restore confidence by serving notice to the people that money is plentiful and as a result money will become cheaper.

Sixth. By putting money in circulation among the masses instead of the classes, it will discourage hoarding.

Seventh. It will make it possible for people to pay their debts and taxes and will bring a definite and speedy end to the worst depression in history.

The Government owes this debt; it must be paid some time and now is the logical time during this serious depression when everybody will be helped and the general welfare of the Nation promoted.

If this just debt is not now paid, practically all of the remainder due the ex-service men on their adjusted-service certificates will be consumed by compound interest paid to the Government and to the banks. The country needs this additional money in circulation.

When the flower of America's manhood responded to their country's call a few short years ago, nothing was too good for them. We pledged every resource of the Nation to the winning of the war and made every promise to our fighting men. Have we forgotten our debt? Are we failing to keep faith?

If the adjusted-service certificates are paid in full without interest deductions, it will mean that $36,108,472.80 will be put in the hands of small merchants, farmers, small bankers, in the State of Tennessee and prosperity again be restored in my State. The obligations of foreign governments to the United States on December 31, 1930, amounted to $11,678,093,000. If our Nation can afford to grant moratoriums on these huge debts due us from foreign nations, surely we can advance to our war veterans slightly in excess of $2,000,000,000 to pay a debt justly due them. The adjusted-service certificates do not represent a bonus, as many mistakenly believe; they represent an honest debt that has been confessed by Congress. This debt is due the soldiers who carried rifles in France and Belgium and slept in the mud of Flanders fields while billions were being made by our citizens manufacturing war material at home to destroy human lives.

Take up our quarrel with the foe:
To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be it yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

Are the Members of the present Congress going to break faith with our former soldiers and sailors and their dependents?

As far as I am concerned, I am pleased to adopt the immortal lines of Mr. Lillard:

Rest ye in peace, ye Flanders dead.
The fight that ye so bravely led
We've taken up.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am and have been from the beginning of this session, in favor of this measure, for to my mind it is one of the measures that will go far toward relieving this terrible depression that has been upon us.

Mr. Speaker, the people of my part of the country are in favor of the passage of this measure for many reasons, both financial and moral. The merchants, bankers, and other business men are in favor of it because it will pay bills at the store, notes at the bank, and relieve unemployment by the circulation of a large amount of money in my district.

For instance, in Tulsa County there will be distributed to the veterans the sum of $3,117,479.88. It will put into circulation in Osage County, $786,691.08; in Washington County $461,653.74; Craig County, $300,024.24; Delaware County, $255,449.40; Mayes County, $297,215.46; Nowata County, $226,214.82; Ottawa County, $640,568.04; Pawnee County, $330,438.84; and Rogers County, $315,048.72. How many thousands of bills to merchants and other like obligations will be paid! It is hard to estimate. Circulation of this vast amount of money in these 10 counties will be of untold benefit to every man, woman, and child.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is therefore sound business for each congressional district in the Nation that the bonus debt be paid. Our per capita debt is $145 for every man, woman, and child. This is not a great burden when we consider that the per capita debt of England is $857, and that of France $2,000.

Under the system of payment devised under this bill, much of the credit for which is due to my fellow citizen, Hon. Robert L. Owen, one of the greatest economists of this age, bonds will be issued in lieu of the adjusted-service certificates, and on these bonds the currency will be issued. The bonus is already an existing debt, so it will add no penny to the public debt of the Nation to pay it by the issuance of bonds and new currency, because the bonds upon which the currency will be based will be equal in amount to the adjusted-compensation certificates already outstanding against the Government.

I am in favor of this legislation for another reason; that is, for currency expansion. Nearly every schoolboy knows that we need an expansion of the currency. This bill will expand it two and one-quarter billions of dollars without increasing the public debt a dime. In the period of 10 years before 1929, we incurred debts at 100 cents on the dollar, the same dollar is now worth $1.56, so the people who owe the debts are confronted with the problem of paying the debts, incurred at 100 cents, at the rate of 156 cents, with the money many times as hard to get. No one opposes currency expansion except the creditor class who receive these Shylock payments at $1.56, and who want dear money instead of cheap money, and want the debts paid to them in dear money at $1.56.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that our Treasury has twice as much gold coin as is necessary for the outstanding currency, so the cry of "fiat money" is altogether ill founded and is false propaganda.

I do not consider this a bonus, but an earned compensation. England gave her men a bonus of $1,427, Belgium, $492, Canada, a private $600, and an officer $972, France $249, and our Government gave our boys a bonus of $60 at a time when $60 did not go very far. Mr. Speaker, I believe that charity begins at home, so I voted against the moratorium, which costs us $263,000,000, and against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which cost us $2,000,000,000, because I knew we could not afford to do either. I reserved my vote to cast it for the earned compensation for the boys who carried the flag across the seas.

Up to 1924, the United States remitted, canceled, or lost the enormous sum of $10,705,618,006.90 in war debts. This Government settled with France at 46 cents on the dollar, Italy at 24 cents, and others likewise. The profligacy of the administrations which so gently treated foreign nations and their obligations has brought us to the deficit we are confronted with and for which my party is in no wise responsible. This deficit is not enlarged or reduced by the passage of this bill.

May I at this time suggest that the men who have recently come to Washington to lobby for this bill have the same right to come as any other interested citizens of the United States. They have been orderly and their conduct has been above reproach. Other interests hire offices and establish a force of clerks by which to present to the Congress the merits of their claims. These men have the same right and I accord them that privilege as American citizens. I am proud to do it.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to cast a vote in favor of this measure which does not add to the public debt, but puts in the mouths of hungry people food and drink, which starts the circulation and expansion of money which we need. It is a great step toward the business revival we so much desire, and any Member of this Congress who casts aspersions on any of the hungry, down and out veterans who have come here in the interest of this measure, enduring hardships almost as great as those who crossed the deep in defense of the flag endured, will have much to think about as the years go by.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I voted "no" on the motion to discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of the resolution to consider H. R. 7726, the Patman bill, and again voted "no" on the adoption of that resolution.

I did so for two reasons. First, I felt that, being a member of the Rules Committee which had heard the application for the rule and had taken no action on it, I could not properly vote to discharge my own committee or vote to adopt a resolution which my committee did not see fit to adopt.

My second reason for so voting was that the resolution provided for the consideration of the Patman bill, H. R. 7726, which merely provided for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates by the issuance of new currency without any provision for financing the payment. For some time I have told many of my colleagues that I could not vote for the Patman plan, but would vote for the Owen plan or any other plan which properly financed the payment.

To-day the Owen plan, H. R. 11992, was for the first time offered and approved in the committee, and with that plan in the bill, I shall support the measure, because I believe it is now economically sound and will contribute to relieving the distressful conditions existing in our country to-day. This money will be distributed in every State, city, and village in the United States among millions of our citizens. It will expand our currency, already shrunk by hoarding and frozen credits.

Beyond relieving the suffering and distress of the immediate recipients and their families, it should stimulate trade and business in every community. In my opinion this stimulation is what the country needs most, a revival of buying and spending as contrasted to hoarding.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I can not but feel that many of the Members who have spoken against the proposed legislation which provided for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates do not understand that it is the intention of the members of the Ways and Means Committee who signed the minority report to amend the Patman bill with the proposal made by former Senator Owen.

If they do, one can not but feel that they do not understand the Owen proposal, for if they did many statements that have been made against the proposed legislation in my opinion would never have been made.

Under the Owen proposal the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denomination, and the same form as Treasury notes, and he shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used in paying of the face value of the World War veterans' adjusted-service certificates.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

The issuing of bonds for this purpose does not create any additional Government obligation, as the adjusted-service certificates that the soldiers hold are already Government obligations, and the only thing we do by this legislation is to deliver to the soldiers a circulating obligation of the Government in the form of Treasury notes in exchange for the noncirculating adjusted-service certificates that they now hold, and order that 20-year United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest be issued and deposited with the Federal reserve banks, to be held by them as the agents of the United States until such time as the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

The proposition of such payment does not call for any additional appropriation out of the Treasury or for the levying of any additional taxes and in no way interferes with the balancing of the Federal Budget, as the bonds are not to bear an interest charge against the Government until the Federal Reserve Board decides that the price of commodities have advanced to the point where it is advisable to sell the bonds to the public, and by so doing contract the currency.

What we need, and, in my opinion, what we must have, in the country before business conditions will improve is more money in circulation. This will put over $2,000,000,000 more money in circulation at once and, not only that, it will put it in every nook and corner of the United States, where it will be put in circulation at once. The soldiers can pay what they owe and buy the things they need for themselves and their families. Those that receive the money from the soldiers will likewise spend the money, which will make a demand for commodities of all kind. Farm products will increase in price and the demand for manufactured articles will create employment, and labor can again be employed.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, the passage of this bill will not only help the World War veterans but will help 90 per cent of the people of the country.

I insert here the figures by counties in my own State and if this proposed legislation becomes a law it would put this much money in circulation in Indiana at once and will not only help the soldier but will help practically every citizen in the State.

Relief from the present economic depression or panic can only be accomplished by increasing commodity values to a normal level and the quickest and best way to accomplish this is through an expansion of the currency or by accelerating the existing volume of the currency. The passage of this bill will do both and thereby do more than any thing else we can do to get us out of the worst depression the Nation has ever known.

Not only the World War veterans are demanding relief but men and women in every walk of life are demanding that this Congress do something to make it possible for them to have a chance to make a living. Between eight and ten million men are out of work and millions of farmers are unable to get the cost of production for their crops. This can not go on much longer. Something must be done to relieve this condition.

The passage of this bill can not but help, for every dollar of this money will be spent here in America; and as I previously stated, will not only help the World War veteran but will help 90 per cent of the people who to-day are demanding, and I think rightly so, that Congress do something that will help them.

The passage of this legislation will help them. Let us hope that it will not only be passed in the House but will be passed in the Senate, and that the President will decide that the time has now come when something must be done that will help not only the soldiers but the unemployed, the farmer, and the average business men of the country, and will sign the bill so it may become a law.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, there has been no question before Congress during the present session concerning which more misleading information has been given to the public than that pertaining to the payment of adjusted-service certificates to World War veterans.

The interests opposed to the payment of adjusted-service certificates have sought by widespread propaganda (1) to create the impression that payment of these certificates at this time would result in such a drain upon the Treasury as to "unbalance the Budget," enlarge the deficit, increase the burden of taxation, prolong the depression, and be generally disastrous to the national welfare; (2) that notwithstanding the fact that the service was rendered in 1917–18, for which adjustment was made by the Government in 1925, it is unfair and unpatriotic to expect payment prior to 1945, the due date of the certificates issued by the Government; (3) by using the term "bonus" instead of "adjusted-service certificate," they have sought to arouse resentment by encouraging the thought that the ex-service men are seeking in a time of national distress to obtain a special gift or gratuity from their Government at the expense of their fellow men; and (4) that relief should be given to all who are in need in preference to a class.

It can readily be understood how effectual such a diversity of reasons would be in creating opposition to the cause of the ex-service man, provided they were justified by the facts. Our attitude for or against measures dealing with public questions is usually based upon the facts as we know them. Much of the difference of opinion existing, not only as to this particular question, but likewise to others, is due to a difference in our knowledge of the pertinent facts. If it were possible for all to be in possession of the same identical facts, our opinions concerning the subject matter would more often agree, and the present case would be no exception. Whatever may be the viewpoint of others, I am firmly convinced, after a most careful ascertainment of the true facts and thoughtful consideration of the same, that payment can now be made of the adjusted-service certificates without creating any of the harmful effects predicted by the opponents of such a course, and, furthermore, without curtailing in the slightest degree the relief that should and will be extended to the needy throughout the Nation.

The opinion that payment of the certificates at this time would drain the Treasury, enlarge the deficit, increase the burden of taxation, and unbalance the Budget is based upon the theory that payment is to be made by a withdrawal of funds from the Federal Treasury or by the issuance of interest-bearing bonds that would create an additional burden of taxation to meet the payment of the same at maturity.

If either of the above plans were the means to be adopted in providing the necessary funds, then the result would be as claimed. However, such is not the plan provided for their payment. It is proposed to replace the present outstanding certificates, which are already an obligation of the Government, by a form of bond to be deposited in the Federal reserve banks and against which currency in the form of Federal reserve bank notes is to be issued and with which payment is to be made. While opponents of the plan have sought to create prejudice by a cry of "flat" or "printing press" money, yet, in fact, the plan is similar and identical in principle with that by which national banks are authorized to issue currency in the form of bank notes, and bears the stamp of approval of leading economists and financial experts who declare that such a plan will not disrupt or disarrange our financial structure and that it is safe and sound.

This plan eliminates the necessity of withdrawing any funds from the Treasury, and consequently it neither increases nor creates a deficit; and, as the present Budget already provides for the payment each year of an amount sufficient to redeem the existing certificates at maturity, the same amount would be applied under the present plan to the redemption of the bonds at maturity, if desired. Thus is provided a means of payment that in no way increases the burden of taxation, and yet provides payment of a debt due our veterans at a time when needed by the vast majority of them.

It will thus be seen, when the real facts are in hand, that there is no basis for either fear or apprehension upon the part of anyone, not even the most conservative; and what would seem from statements of opponents to be a real menace of disaster, if payment was now made, evaporates as a phantom into thin air under the strong light of the true facts.

The charge, however, that the present outstanding certificates are not due and payable until 1945 is true, except to the extent or qualification that they are immediately payable in case of death. This fact, therefore, presents for consideration the question, Why should such certificates be paid now instead of in 1945? The arguments against payment often seem to be based on the thought that it is an open question whether any adjusted compensation should be paid to veterans. In support of such a position reference is often made to the expenditures each year by the Government in providing hospitalization, medical care, and compensation to wounded and disabled veterans, and death benefits to the dependents of deceased veterans, and the thought expressed that no further obligation exists upon the part of the Government.

This is not a true statement of the facts. The actual fact is that not only has the Government very definitely committed itself to the policy of caring for its wounded and disabled ex-service men and the dependents of deceased veterans, as it should do, but it has likewise definitely determined that there is due to those who served in the World War service compensation, adjusted on the basis of one dollar for each day of service on this side of the water during the World War and one dollar and a quarter for each day of service on the other side, plus 25 per cent for a deferred payment in 1945, and interest thereon until that time. This is a definite, settled, and determined obligation of the Government enacted by Congress in 1925, and for which certificates of indebtedness have been issued by the Government to World War veterans. Therefore the only question is whether the ex-service men are entitled to payment at this time instead of waiting until 1945 or death prior to that time.

In the first place, before giving consideration to the thought that in equity and good conscience the adjusted compensation is due now notwithstanding the terms of the certificates making it payable in 1945, I wish to emphasize the fact that the vast majority of our ex-service men are in dire need. A survey made by the director of the Veterans' Employment Service, Department of Labor, some months ago corroborates this fact, and undoubtedly in the time that has elapsed since that report was made the conditions have become much worse.

The letters from ex-service men or from members of their families that come into my office each day reveal a situation that is pitiable. Homes being sold over their heads because of inability to pay mortgages or refinance them; families of six and seven feeling the pangs of hunger and destitution and need in every conceivable form, all because of inability to procure work. And can it be possible that these are the men who but a few years ago received the plaudits of an appreciative people as they went forth to sustain and support our Nation in the hour of emergency? And yet, to-day very often the very men who in that day sang their praises the loudest, but stayed behind to "keep the home fires," and, incidentally, reaped the rich harvest of high wages and great wealth that came to those who did not enter the service, are the ones who cry loudest against present-day recognition of the claims of ex-service men for help in an hour of need. Look about you and observe, and you will find that practically without exception the man who raises his voice in opposition to payment at this time is a man who was not in the service and who, either as employer or employee, received in 1917–18 the benefits of the unparalleled prosperity of that war time.

Let us ponder for a moment what our condition as a nation and as individuals would have been to-day had not our boys been successful in that great conflict, and as we realize that what we have to-day—ideals and even the material things of life—was made secure by those who some would now seem to dishonor and forget, then, if conscience and gratitude are not dead within us, acknowledge our indebtedness and give that help they so sorely need as they gave their help in our hour of national need.

Furthermore, I would impress upon you the fact that seems to have been entirely overlooked during the entire discussion of this matter, and that is the fact that the service for which compensation adjustment has been determined was rendered in 1917–18, and yet the argument of those who are opposing payment now would indicate that the compensation therefor is not due until 1945 unless death should sooner occur. In answer let me ask: Do you know of anyone who rendered service in 1917–18 in any capacity whatsoever, "butcher, baker, or candlestock maker," who did not receive his compensation then? Do you know of any corporation that supplied war materials to the Government in 1917–18 that had to wait until 1925 to have compensation adjusted, and then have payment deferred until 1945? No; of course not. It is true, however, that many of these corporations that supplied war materials found years afterwards that adjustments were due them, but in each instance payment was ordered and adjustment made on the basis of 1917–18, with accrued interest at 6 per cent to date of settlement. The United States Steel Corporation and the Aluminum Co. of America and others too numerous to mention were so compensated and received millions of dollars in settlement.

But in contrast to the fair and honorable treatment accorded others who had rendered service or had claims to collect, the soldiers who gave the highest order of service, at a personal as well as a financial sacrifice, enduring hardships and inconveniences little known by those who did not serve, were compelled to wait until 1925 before even their claim was acknowledged, and then told to wait for payment until death, or if alive in 1945, to take it, provided a balance should remain after payment of loans obtained with interest compounded, and enjoy it as old age began to creep upon them. I resent the idea expressed by some of the opponents of this measure that the ex-service men are seeking a preference. They are not. They are simply asking that they be treated the same as everyone else has been treated who rendered civilian service or sold materials to the Nation while at war. They are only asking that which is just and right—"That they be done unto as others have been done unto."

Now I wish to call your attention to a feature of the adjusted-service-certificate enactment passed by Congress in 1925 that demonstrates beyond any doubt that, regardless of the technical terms of the legislation and the certificates issued thereunder, fixing the dates when payments may be made, the spirit of the law would justify the payment of the certificates at this time.

The feature to which I direct your attention is the reason that underlies the two dates fixed by the act for payment, namely, (1) death, and (2) 1945, this latter being a time when the average age of a World War veteran will be 51 years. In both instances it will be recognized that a condition of need would probably, if ever, exist. In the case of death, the family of the veteran is cut off from his services in their behalf; consequently a time of need. Such a condition was recognized as likely to exist, and hence the certificates were made payable at that time, even though prior to the year 1945. The latter date would likewise be a probable time of need for the reason that, with approaching years, and especially after 45 years of age, it is difficult for employment to be obtained in any industrial establishment. This difficulty increases rapidly with additional years. Therefore, when it is considered that the average age of our ex-service men at that time would be 51, and recognizing that many must necessarily be beyond that age, then it can be readily assumed that a time of need would likewise exist, a need that would grow out of difficulty in obtaining employment. It was therefore proper that these times of need should be taken into consideration in framing the legislation providing for the payment of adjusted compensation.

The law acknowledging an obligation upon the part of the Government for the payment of adjusted compensation to World War veterans was passed in 1925, a time of unparalleled prosperity. In a time such as that it would hardly be possible to have considered that any other time of need could arise—certainly no such conditions as now confront our Nation were considered as possible to happen. This view is emphasized by the fact that no provision was made in the law to permit even a borrowing on the basis of accrued value to any soldier who might through circumstances find himself in need. Hence, there was a necessity at the last session of Congress to pass such an amendment. But, in doing so, Congress fixed a rate of interest which, if compounded, would eliminate any further value to the certificate, provided the loan was not repaid before 1945. Therefore, unless this present bill is passed, service men who found it necessary last year to borrow on their certificates, and who through present conditions are unable to make repayment, will never receive another cent from the Government on the certificates which they now hold. But, the point I wish particularly to emphasize is the fact that a new condition of need has arisen, a need that is evidenced in many cases for the very necessities of life and bordering upon a condition of absolute destitution.

The conditions now prevailing throughout the country create a need just as real as that produced by death or by inability to obtain employment at an advanced age. The spirit of the law that recognized need as the time at which payment should be made justifies a recognition by Congress at the time of a new need just as real and imperative as that which was recognized in 1925 when the original act was passed. The spirit of the law justifies us in rearranging its technical terms to give expression, not merely of our gratitude for services rendered but to that human instinct which would alleviate those in need.

Time and again the opponents of this measure have referred to it as a "bonus" bill. Evidently the purpose was to create the impression that the enactment of this bill would provide a gift to our ex-service men. Nothing is farther from the truth. This is not a gift. It is compensation, and poor compensation at that, for services rendered. It has been said by some that patriotism can never be paid for. This is true, and no one could justly consider the present bill as in any way a compensation for patriotism. If such were the case, it could never have been adjusted upon the basis of a dollar a day. It is an insult for anyone in opposing this bill to say that the trifling allotment of $1 a day for service rendered on this side of the water, or $1.25 a day for the service rendered "over there" in the mud and filth of the trenches, is compensation for their patriotic endeavor, and then to refer to it as a "bonus" is adding insult to injury.

If the Government had dealt fairly in the matter of adjusted-service compensation, the debt would have been paid long ago, and instead of such not being due until 1945, as claimed by so many who have spoken against the bill, the fact is that on the basis the service was rendered in 1917–18, and with 6 per cent interest from that time until the present, it was due in full on October 1, 1931. It is an overdue payment instead of a payment not yet due. And do not overlook the fact that a payment upon this basis is merely recognizing and applying a principle to soldier compensation that has already been acknowledged and applied by the Government to compensation and claims paid to others. It is not doing for the soldiers any more than has been done for civilians; and if a preference had been asked in behalf of our ex-service men, who more than they would be entitled to such consideration?

Finally, I wish to suggest how unfortunate as well as unfair has been the effort to create the impression that any payment made to an ex-service man at this time would result in diminishing the relief to be given to others throughout our land, and that relief should be on a basis that would include all rather than a class.

This viewpoint overlooks entirely the fact that while indirectly there is justification for the passage of the present bill as a relief measure, yet the undeniable fact is that it is in an entirely different class than a relief measure, because it is the payment of a debt already acknowledged by the Government as owing. Already millions of dollars have been expended by charitable organizations and municipal and State governments for the relief of all who are in need. Congress since it convened in December last has been concerned in the passage of legislation that has provided for the expenditure of millions, yes, billions, of dollars in an effort to revive business and create employment. Congress is now ready to pass, and will pass before it adjourns, relief measures carrying expenditures of millions of dollars for use by the States and municipalities in direct relief for the needy; and there will be no adjournment of Congress by my vote until adequate provision has been made for general relief.

There is no thought upon the part of anyone who supports this bill to deny one dollar that is necessary to give the relief that will care for destitute and starving people. The passage of this measure does not indicate a choice as between relief for soldiers and relief for people generally. It is no more, and it is no less, than a payment of a debt, and certain I am that those who support this measure would not do so if the enactment of such would in any way curtail or prevent the giving of help to all classes who are now in need.

This bill is not selfish in character nor restricted in its benefits to a soldier class. Bear in mind that it will bring benefits not merely to 4,000,000 ex-service men, but to their families as well, and will thereby touch approximately 20,000,000, or one-sixth of our entire population. And the benefits of this act will not stop even there. The money under this act will go into every nook and corner of our great country. It will be utilized to pay debts long past due, stop foreclosures, and provide health and the necessities of life for millions. In the expenditure of these funds the merchants, the banks, and small business men in every community will feel its beneficial effects.

It will mean the expenditure in the first congressional district of New Jersey, which I have the honor to represent, of almost $7,000,000. Of this amount the veterans of Camden County will receive $4,826,728.56, and there will be paid to the veterans of Gloucester County $1,354,442.26, and to those of Salem County $704,634.42, making a grand total of $6,885,805.24 that will enter into the channels of trade of the three counties comprising the first congressional district of New Jersey. And all of this without one cent of additional expense to the Treasury of the United States, because of the wise plan adopted, and without adding one cent to the tax burden of our people. In this connection do not forget that the money so to be paid would not be wasted. Investigation conducted by the Veterans' Administration as to how and in what manner the moneys loaned on adjusted-service certificates had been expended revealed the fact that 93 per cent had been used in discharging obligations, making worth-while purchases, and in other wise and judicious ways.

Therefore, in conclusion, this bill, instead of being for the benefit of a favored few, will result in beneficial effects that can not be estimated and that will touch directly or indirectly practically all of our entire citizenship. And if this were not sufficient justification for favorable consideration being given to the bill, then let it be upon the basis of our discharging a national debt long past due for a quality of service that brought safety and security to our entire people.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to speak at length this morning. I realize that in all probability nothing I can say will change a single vote in the House. I desire, however, to record myself with all possible sincerity as opposed to the enactment at this time of the measure now under consideration. I do not question the motives of any Member of the House. Others may estimate the situation confronting the Nation at this time as less serious than I do. I hope my estimate is wrong. In the light of that estimate, however, in the light of observation in other countries in recent years, I feel compelled to state, regardless of political consequences, that I could not support the pending measure to-day without feeling that I had failed to measure up to my responsibility to district and Nation.

I speak as a veteran of the World War. I speak as one privileged to wear the uniform of our country for upwards of two years, both in America and in France during that war. I speak as one who has a genuine feeling of comradeship for every veteran of that war—for every veteran of every war in which this country has engaged. I speak as one who always has done and always will do all that he properly can to further the best interests of these, our comrades. And, Mr. Chairman, I speak as one who believes that no thinking veteran would expect him or any other Member of this House to take any action which, in his honest judgment, carried with it a real danger to the Nation as a whole.

In my judgment, the enactment at this time of the bill under consideration would carry with it the possibility of the gravest danger to the welfare of the Nation.

Throughout this session we have been striving to bring the National Budget into balance. We have been striving also to assure the integrity of the national credit and the national currency. Why have we striven to realize these objectives? Simply because upon their realization depends in large measure that intangible force called confidence, that force which is so vital to the country at this time; confidence at home, confidence abroad in the financial stability of the Nation. Without that confidence recovery is impossible. Without that confidence, economic difficulties far greater than those yet experienced in this Nation may well be in store. That confidence, Mr. Chairman, is highly sensitive. Confidence in a Nation, like confidence in a financial institution, is easily destroyed. Once destroyed, no institution, no Nation, financially speaking, can escape disaster.

Developments during the past summer demonstrate this fact conclusively. Austria, Germany, England. Successive runs on each; withdrawal of short-term funds in the equivalent of hundreds of millions of dollars; depletion of central-bank reserves; threat of financial collapse; government intervention; restriction of bank payments and foreign exchange; suspension of gold payments, even in America the withdrawal in a matter of weeks of funds amounting to upward of seven hundred millions of dollars, all the result of loss of confidence.

The bill under consideration not only provides for the immediate discharge of large indebtedness, which is not due and which will not become due until 1945. It not only provides for the payment of this indebtedness to veterans of the World War, whether in need or not, at a time when we are bending every energy to find ways and means to help meet the commanding problem of unemployment relief throughout the Nation. It provides also for the discharge of this indebtedness through that most dangerous process, the issue of fiat money to the extent of two billions four hundred millions of dollars, with possible adverse effect which no one can estimate.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the enactment of this legislation at this time would carry with it a body blow to essential confidence, both at home and abroad, in the financial stability of this country. In my judgment, it would carry with it the possibility of the withdrawal of hundreds of millions of dollars by depositors, both at home and abroad, endangering our banking structure, our credit, our currency.

I have seen something, Mr. Chairman, in other lands of the human misery which is possible as a result of a policy which depreciates credit and currency. For four years I was face to face with it in Germany and witnessed the struggle by government after government in the endeavor to alleviate it. No words can describe it. Similar conditions were to be found in Austria, in Hungary, and in other countries in central Europe. France, too, had its share of suffering, being rescued from complete breakdown by a program of rigid economy and drastic taxation under the leadership of Poincaré. No one sensing that suffering could run the risk for one moment of inviting it or any part of it to our shores.

Recovery in this Nation, with the permanent alleviation of the suffering which is already ours, is dependent upon the restoration of confidence. Nothing, in my judgment, is more conducive to making that confidence impossible than unsound legislation which threatens the National Budget, the national credit, the national currency. Destroy the confidence that remains and you will threaten the well-being of every American citizen, veteran, and nonveteran alike.

The enemy, Mr. Chairman, which menaced the Nation during the World War was apparent to all. It took self-sacrifice, courage, and united national action to overcome that enemy and bring us victory. Those same qualities are called for to-day if we are to overcome the enemy which confronts us at this time—an enemy far more difficult to visualize but no less menacing.

The fact that the pending measure can not become law at the present session of Congress must be apparent to us all. Its defeat in the House at this time would make that fact apparent to the entire country, restoring that confidence which has been lost as a result of its consideration at this time.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the hardships and privations that our present industrial depression has brought to the ex-service men. Neither am I unmindful of the suffering and the privation to-day of millions of our citizens, who through no fault of their own have not been privileged to be ex-service men. During all my service in this body I have always been sympathetic toward legislation looking to the relief of the veterans of all our wars.

The pending bill, known as the Patman bill, provides for the issuing of $2,400,000,000 of United States Treasury notes, for the purpose of paying in full the bonus obligations of the United States Government. In other words, under the terms of this bill the United States Government is to print new money to settle these obligations.

The adjusted-service certificates held by the ex-service men are due and payable in 1945. The Seventy-first Congress passed a law permitting the ex-service men to borrow 50 per cent of the face value of their certificates at an interest rate of 4½ per cent. This bill is being urged not because the adjusted-service certificates are due and payable at this time, not because the ex-service men are more in need than others of the millions of the unemployed, but because by the printing of $2,400,000,000 of new paper money by the United States Government and the giving of the same to the ex-service men in payment for their adjusted-service certificates Congress will help not only the ex-service men but the whole country by bringing about a revival of industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have given hours and hours to the reading of the hearings on this bill, contained in a volume of about 900 pages, and, besides, for months I have given serious study to the proposal contained in this bill. It is my conclusion from all the information I have been able to gather, and from all the authorities that I have been able to consult, that the issuing of $2,400,000,000 of paper money, new money, fiat money, rag money by the United States Government at this time in settlement of the bonus obligations would bring about an unemployment situation infinitely worse than exists to-day.

Our trouble to-day appears to be not a lack of money, for we have $1,000,000,000 more in circulation to-day than we had in 1929, at the peak of our prosperity, but rather a lack of confidence in the financial stability of the United States Treasury, and the soundness and integrity of our banking institutions. The passage of this bill will, in my judgment, do more to destroy confidence in our banking institutions and in the soundness of our money system than almost any other thing that this Congress could do.

As I read the hearings on this bill, I can draw but one conclusion and that is that if this measure becomes a law our country would be forced off the gold standard, and industrial and financial chaos would result.

It may have been all right for England to have gone off the gold standard because England's prosperity lies in her foreign trade and her obligations are mostly payable in the pound sterling, while our country's prosperity is largely involved with our domestic trade and millions and millions of our obligations, Government and individual, are payable in gold.

The American dollar and not the pound sterling is to-day the standard of value of international trade. There is no fundamental difference between the Patman bill and the Owens bill, which has been substituted for the Patman bill. Both bills provide for a huge inflation of our currency, and the mere announcement that either one of these bills is to become the law of our land would immediately greatly depreciate our money and cause gold to go out of the country and to be hoarded at home.

When England went off the gold standard about a year ago $700,000,000 in gold left this country in two months. This movement of gold is said to be the greatest flight of gold in all history. If this bill should be passed, the gold flight of 1931 will have to take a second place to the gold flight of 1932.

The author of this bill says that we have not money enough in this country to do business on, that prices are too low, and that we must start the printing press in order to start the coming of prosperity. As I have stated, we have more money in our country to-day than we had in 1929 at the height of our great prosperity, and we are doing 40 per cent less business than we did at that time.

It is quite apparent that there is something else lacking in our country to-day than a scarcity of money. The banks are filled with money as never before. If our industrial world lacks a sufficient supply of money, we have a safe way of supplying that need through the Federal reserve system without trying a hazardous method that the best minds of the country say will produce wreck and ruin to industry and make unemployment the rule instead of the exception.

Mr. Speaker, I can not vote for this bill for another reason. The hearings on this bill disclose the fact that only 18 per cent of the unemployed are ex-service men and that only about one-third of the ex-service men are out of work. Assuming that it would be safe and beneficial for Congress to authorize the issue of $2,400,000,000 of new money, is it possible that our ex-service men, who were willing to make every sacrifice for their country in a time of war, have become so selfish as to demand that such a huge sum of money be appropriated for their special benefit alone at a time when there are perhaps 8,000,000 other American citizens unemployed and many of them starving?

Many of our larger cities and not a few States of the Union are beseeching Congress to make Federal appropriations to help them in their herculean task of feeding and housing their large armies of unemployed. It is submitted that if Congress can make an appropriation of $2,400,000,000 or can issue that much new money with safety to industry and the stability of our financial institutions that such money should be used to feed and to provide work for all of the unemployed and to aid agriculture and industry, and not be given to a class of our citizens, two-thirds of whom are not members of the army of the unemployed.

It is said that this law will help business and end the panic by putting this huge sum of money in circulation. A year ago the same argument was made when Congress passed a law putting twelve hundred million dollars in circulation when it permitted the ex-service men to borrow on their certificates. Nobody noticed any great improvement in business as a result of the payment at that time of more than one-half of the sum that this bill calls for to our ex-service men; in fact, the industrial situation is getting worse, and there is no guaranty that the $1,600,000,000 that will go under the terms of this bill to the ex-service men not out of work will immediately reach the buying counter.

We hear a great deal through the press and from the veterans about Congress having given $2,000,000,000 to the railroads, the banks, and the insurance companies, and having treated these institutions in such a manner, should be able and willing to give $2,400,000,000 to the ex-service men in payment of the balance of their bonus obligations. Congress has not given $2,000,000,000 to the railroads, the banks, and the insurance companies. It has not given a dollar to any such institutions. Congress has provided by law for the loaning of $1,500,000,000 to banks, insurance companies, railroads, building and loan associations, and so forth; these loans are made on an interest basis, and to date only about $700,000,000 has been thus loaned.

These institutions are getting money from the United States Treasury on the same basis as the veterans got their loans on their certificates. I sympathize with the army of the ex-service men who have gathered here in Washington for the purpose of urging the passage of the Patman bill. These men have been misled. They have been told that their Government, that has been running behind $7,000,000 a day for the past year, had plenty of money, and could and should pay the balance of their bonus obligations in full; that all the Government has to do is to start the printing press, issue paper money, rag money, and hand the money to the veterans, and our country will once more become prosperous.

If this bill will do what its proponents say it will do—raise the price level about 100 per cent—our country will be engaged in the doubtful business of paying the bonus boys off with a 50-cent dollar, or phony money.

Another reason that the ex-service men have been asking for the full and final payment of their bonus obligations at this time is because of the fact that the interest rate fixed by Congress on their loans is so high that when 1945 comes around most of the men will have nothing coming from the Government. I favor a reduction in the interest required to pay on the money borrowed on these adjusted-service certificates to about 3 per cent, or to an interest rate that equals what the Government has had to pay on the money loaned to pay these certificates.

I have been warned that if I vote against the pending bill my vote will retire me to private life. It is possible that such a result will follow and with no great loss to governmental Washington. However, if I were to vote for this bill, believing as I do that it constitutes dangerous and unsound legislation and an unjustifiable discrimination by Congress in the relief of a few to the neglect of the many, then my vote would be cast that way because I feared ballots more than the veterans ever feared bullets.

If my vote on this bill will retire me to private life, I will have the consolation of knowing that in my political exile from Washington I will have the company of my self-respect.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to urge the favorable consideration of this bill to provide for the immediate payment in cash of the adjusted-compensation certificates. First, however, I want to call your attention to the remarks which were made in this body several days ago by the gentleman from South Dakota who said that he absolved himself of all responsibility for any injury, sickness, or suffering caused by reason of the bonus march on the Capital. I say to you gentlemen that the responsibilty for the sickness, injury, and suffering of veterans who have made this pilgrimage to Washington rests directly upon the shoulders of the leaders of this Congress, who have deliberately delayed the consideration of this measure, notwithstanding the fact that the majority of the Members of this House are in favor of its passage.

The leaders of this House have always made it very clear that it is not right and it is not proper—that it is not the theory of the House that a minority should obstruct a majority. But, gentlemen, throughout this session we have beheld the unholy spectacle of these same gentlemen deliberately obstructing this worthy piece of legislation which is in the interests of all of the people of the United States. Congress itself is responsible for the veterans coming here, because the veterans realized that Congress was "stalling" and was not giving this measure, which was so vital to them and to the entire country, the proper and fair consideration it deserved.

Some of the newspapers have tried to tag the bonus march on Washington as being a communist march; but the veterans have entirely disproved this false statement as they did in 1917 and 1918 when they fought for their country.

There are five reasons why I am particularly anxious to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates in cash now:

First. That morally this obligation is due now; had the Government paid the veteran interest from 1917 and 1918 when the services were rendered, instead of dating that interest as of 1925, and had the Government not deducted from the base compensation the $60 which the soldier was entitled to as compensation for the clothes that the Government took from him when he enlisted, and were the Government to pay the rate of going interest which the veteran has to pay, instead of the amount that an endowment policy from a private insurance company would earn, then the adjusted-compensation certificates would be due now.

Second. If we do not pay them now, those who have borrowed one-half the face value will have nothing to collect in 1945; in fact, they will be owing money to the Government.

Third. Because the payment now, under the Patman-Owen plan for controlled currency expansion, will tend to bolster up commodity prices, which is the first essential of normal prosperity, and will provide badly needed direct relief, which will be equally distributed.

Fourth. Due to the fact that credits have been contracted, we must expand our currency or resort to bartering as our forefathers did.

Fifth. Because the payment will not cost the taxpayers one additional cent.

When the additional currency provided for in this plan is issued—and remember that we are merely paying an old debt, taking up an existing obligation, not a new one—it will be widely and equally distributed throughout the United States; money goes in every city, in every town, in every hamlet, and in every community of this entire country. The people, and not the banks, become its beneficiaries.

The more I have studied this proposition the more positive I have become in my opinion that there has been no bill proposed here which will more surely serve to bring about the happy result—and, to my mind, that necessary result—the lowering of the value of gold and providing an increased value of commodities.

Gentlemen, I do not have the time to enter into a lengthy discussion of the gold standard; pages and pages of material have already been devoted to this subject. I do not have time to prove to you that the passage of this measure will not endanger the credit of our country. Expert testimony has already been made to that effect.

Gentlemen, the time has come in our national existence when we must have an expansion of our currency, such as this bill will provide. I say that for this reason: The dollar is now worth $2.03 compared with what it was worth in normal times.

How can you expect a farmer or working man to pay a debt he contracted for $1 in normal times when he has to repay that debt with $2.03 to-day?

How can you gentlemen expect a farmer to pay the now high taxes you have levied when he received only a fraction of the normal price for the products which he has to sell.

The farmer is not asking for a dole. He is asking only for an opportunity to do business on the basis of an honest and just dollar, and the passage of this bill will make it possible for the farmer to receive a just and normal price for his farm products.

The administration has seen fit to give aid to foreign countries, to insurance companies, and to the railroads, but none of these measures has restored prosperity. It all goes to show that we can not build a house by starting with the roof. We must start with the foundation and put the farmer and workingman in position to earn a fair living.

Shortly after the war the administration paid more than $3,000,000,000 to war contractors, had given and loaned $2,000,000,000 to railroads, and millions to feed the hungry of Europe. There is never any argument about how to get money or where to get it when the direct interest of the big interests are involved. The theory is to make successful those on top of the heap and some of their profits will sift through to the masses of the people.

Twenty-six billion dollars war expense, then $3,000,000,000 to war profiteers, and $2,000,000,000 to the railroads immediately after the war, billions of dollars to European nations by way of war-debt reductions, and all the hundreds of millions recently paid out for other purposes certainly convinces me that this Nation should pay the adjusted-service certificates.

Undoubtedly there is no reason why we could not adopt the method of refinancing herein suggested when these obligations now outstanding are due in major part, if not in whole—particularly when the refinancing is without cost of an added cent to the Treasury of the United States. While I may refrain from fully expressing my attitude toward the human equation involved, I can not, in my mind and heart, forget the boys of yesterday who were the proud defenders of our flag. We have heard talk about the payment of $6,000,000,000 for their injuries and illnesses. As an economic proposition, how many billions of dollars has this country taken from them in their physical and mental inability to pursue their hopes and their ambitions?

Gentlemen, here is a direct challenge to your sincerity. Here is an opportunity to pay a just debt to loyalty and sacrifice.

The passage of this bill will not in any way impair the credit of the United States. On the other hand, it will do an enormous amount of good, not only to the veteran, but also to the farmer and workingman in the fact that there will be a resultant rise in commodity prices.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, the recent action of the House in the adoption of the rule making possible consideration of this measure to-day indicates, in my opinion, that the majority of the Members of this Congress are conversant with the Owen provision of financing the payment of the so-called bonus. I think most of us are convinced that this plan will insure a safe and necessary method of expanding the currency to meet this emergency. I do not think any of the supporters of this legislation will be swayed from extending relief to the ex-service men of the Nation by the shop worn threats that the proposed plan of financing payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates will throw us off the gold standard, destroy the credit structure of the Government, or unbalance the Budget.

The American people approved and applauded the action of Congress in providing for adjusted compensation, insuring payment of certificates in 1945. Thousands of ex-service men who are in need at the present time are not going to be alive in 1945, unless we furnish by the adoption of this measure the financial oxygen to alleviate their distress, and to spare them suffering and hunger, which is the result of conditions over which they have no control. We all appreciate there are millions of people on the border line of actual starvation to-day, and this Congress has reached the conclusion that Federal aid to relieve the unemployment situation will be forthcoming before we adjourn.

Because of the fact that we have millions of other people besides the ex-soldiers of the Nation, literally standing in the bread line, I can to a degree sympathize with the attitude of our courageous colleague [Mr. LAGUARDIA] of New York, who for the time being opposes this legislation. I am not going to address myself to the question of whether or not our act in passing this bill would represent a discrimination against others who are in dire need.

However, I do want to take issue with another distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. HAMILTON FISH, who from the floor of this House the other day, while opposing the motion to relieve the committee from further consideration of this resolution, made a significant statement with reference to the ex-service men of the Nation. He said, "We owe them nothing." Then he resorted to the implication that the presence of several thousand veterans at the National Capital was tantamount to an act of coercion toward the Members of this Congress. I do not know of a single threat against any Member of Congress coming from the ex-service men who are here at Washington or elsewhere throughout the land. They have just as much right to lobby in behalf of this measure as the bankers and predatory interests did in behalf of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and many other measures passed by this Congress. Whether or not they were ill advised in coming here in such large numbers is not an issue. Their conduct during their stay here demonstrates that they are orderly, quiet, and patriotic.

The statement that "we owe them nothing" is a reflection of the sentiment that many of us receive by way of protest from the privileged class of the country who are opposing the soldiers' bonus. This class who belong to the house of privilege is made up of one-third of 1 per cent of our population, and it is they who control 60 per cent of the Nation's wealth. Their membership includes steel magnates, captains of industry, czars of railroads and shipping industries, the war profiteers, financial jugglers, and international bankers who always play an important part in fomenting war and creating panics and depressions.

Back in 1917 and 1918 when the soldiers and sailors of our Nation were making the world safe for democracy, this privileged class was engaged in the innocent pastime of making millions of dollars to add to their swollen fortunes. If there is to be a privileged class in the Republic, let it be those boys we took from the countryside, from the towns and cities, and from the universities; those boys we took from the factory and office; those boys we took from their families and loved ones and shipped them like cattle across the sea to fight, many of them untrained, in a cruel war, and to live in rain-soaked and vermin-infected trenches. All that for the preservation of a so-called democracy.

You say, "We owe them nothing." The Government paid them the munificent sum of $30 a month, out of which many of them paid their premium on their war insurance and their payments on the Liberty bonds to the tune of 100 cents on the dollar, only to find that within a few months after the discontinuance of hostilities when they were in need of money and had to sell or hypothecate these Liberty bonds, they had to do so at a loss of 10 to 15 per cent, thanks to the money changers in the temple of Wall Street who manipulated the Liberty and Victory bond issues of the country.

These doughboys are fully aware of the agencies opposing this effort to secure relief. The newspapers of the country who are now opposing the soldiers' bonus are the same newspapers who prior to our entry into the World War and during the duration of the conflict became the beneficiaries of the untold wealth of Lord Northcliffe because of the malicious, deliberate slander and false propaganda they spread throughout this country against Germany and her people as a whole, in an effort to bolster up patriotism and incite hatred and lust for blood in the American people.

The doughboys know now that they fought a war not necessarily to get rid of the Kaiser and the Hohenzollerns of Germany but to assist in the extension of imperialism throughout Europe, as evidenced by the spoils of the war in the form of thousands of miles of territory and the acquisition of control over millions of subjected people allocated to Great Britain, France, and our other allies by the vicious treaty of Versailles. The doughboys know the destruction of 11,000,000 human beings and the maiming of 19,000,000 more was the price paid to make secure several of the thrones and the crowned heads of certain royal families on the continent of Europe. They know now that Uncle Sam received the worst of that conflict, and they remember that when they marched down Fifth Avenue, Pennsylvania Avenue, or Main Street they were acclaimed with music, flowers, and applause, and that when they emerged from the conflict and returned to civil life, in many instances, they found the factory gates closed against them, their old jobs gone, and all they have to show for their efforts to make the world safe for democracy are bodies damaged mentally and physically.

I am conscious of the splendid effort of the Nation to take care of the sick and disabled veterans, and I am conscious of the abuse of legislation in extending many benefits to those who become ill or injured through no service-connected disability.

The gentleman who states "we owe them nothing" is very much interested in the activities of the communists in the United States. He sees a Trotsky, a Lenin, or a Stalin on every street corner and at every crossroad. If there be clouds of revolution on the horizon, as some say there are, then I am fearful if the Government takes the attitude "we owe them nothing" the ranks of communism will grow and the capitalistic system of our Government, now on trial in the United States, will disappear. Disillusioned as they are these men are still patriotic and loyal to the free institutions of America. If you are going to deprive them the relief they are seeking through this legislation, then explain if you can the conduct of our Government in scaling billions of dollars from the war debt of foreign governments; explain if you can the granting of the moratorium to foreign nations; explain if you can our action in this Congress in appropriating $450,000 to defray the expenses of four delegates and their personnel who are sitting at the disarmament conference at Geneva in a futile attempt to bring about world peace; explain if you can the action of the Government in subscribing to $500,000,000 of stock in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and its pledge of $1,500,000,000 to assist the house of privilege and big interests in this country.

Yes, you may say the Reconstruction Finance Corporation takes ample security for the loans negotiated. Many of us have a suspicion that they are accepting the same security that caused the failure of 4,000 banks throughout the Nation in 1931. Unless there is a phenomenal rise in the value of these securities, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation comes to rendering an account of its stewardship, I will wager that Uncle Sam will have an oversupply of engraved lithographed securities sufficient to paper the walls of the White House. These boys gave the best security in the world for the loan they are seeking to-day. They gave their youth, their health; they offered their lives to the service of the Nation. Do not let it be said that the Nation will fail them in this their critical hour. The great mass of the American public, who are not attached to the house of privilege, will not concur in the sentiment expressed on the floor of this House that "we owe them nothing." On the contrary, their action will be reflected in the votes of the Representatives within a short time, which will be a message to the ex-service men of the Nation that the Government of the United States is an appreciative Government, and that we do owe something to those who made the sacrifice for us in time of war.

If there are rumblings of unrest and talk of revolution throughout the land, it is due not to the conduct of these ex-service men and the millions of our citizens who are now pleading for Federal aid from the Government to prevent them from starving, but rather to the breakdown in the capitalistic system long sustained by Government favor and privilege at the expense of the taxpayers of the Nation.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House who are supporting this legislation assume the position that the time has come when the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in full. It is contended, and justly so, that the transaction can be consummated to the advantage of the country, the betterment of our economic situation, and for the relief of our distressed veterans. Like every great question, this question is a 2-sided one. It has its friends and its foes, those who honestly and conscientiously defend and denounce it.

While the proponents point to the soundness of the Owen plan which has been accepted by the sponsors of the Patman bill, the opposition still voices the opinion that it is fiat and printing-press money that will wreak havoc and chaos upon our people. This contention has not only been denounced by the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee reporting the measure, as well as by the sponsors of the bill, but their fears have also been dissipated by the evidence presented at the hearings by the very best authorities on this question in the country, the statement that this legislation might lead us to the precipice of disaster and cause a money panic to break upon us is ineffective because we have already reached that point even though we have passed every so-called relief measure so far recommended by the President, including the moratorium, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, the Glass-Steagall bill, the bill to sustain the bonds of the farm-loan banks, the revenue bill, and within a few days we may add to this list the economy bill as well as home-loan bank bill. All this we have done at the request of the President and the financial leaders and yet business declined more in 1931 from 1930 and more in 1932 from 1931, and is at present declining at an increased rate every month.

These measures so far provide only opportunities for business but not business itself. They begin at the top with money instead of at the bottom with money and work. They do not, in my opinion, attack the cause but merely apply to the effect of our economic difficulties. Everyone will admit that the dollar to-day is a swollen dollar. Experts maintain that it is valued at $2 as compared with the dollar of 1919 and that it has a value of approximately $1.60 as compared with the value of the dollar in 1926. While the dollar has reached its highest point, commodity prices are at the lowest level in our country's history and until this differential between the dollar and the commodity values is narrowed there can be no substantial basic relief for our country and its suffering people.

This measure which we are now considering aims to bring about the happy results which all admit are necessary to the proper solution of our economic ills. If this measure will result in a degree of inflation of values, as the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee set forth in their report upon the bill, and as the opponents of this measure advance as one of their objections to its passage, that objection is dissipated by expert opinion which holds that this is just what is needed at the present time.

While I have never recommended debasing the currency, do we admit that our currency was debased in 1928 and 1929 when the purchasing power of the dollar was only one-fourth of the purchasing power of the dollar of to-day? Is the dollar more sacred than humanity and does it possess greater rights than man? Is it necessary that our citizens lose their homes, their character, and be reduced to the depths of human misery in the midst of an abundance of every human need in order that we maintain the dollar at its present highest level? The opponents of this measure seek to maintain the wages of money while its sponsors, with due regard for the currency of the Nation, would maintain the wages of labor. Our present economic condition, which finds us fighting with our backs to the wall, was accentuated by a deliberate attempt to manipulate the values of securities in the expectation of making large fortunes. The crisis came in October of 1929. Then values of securities declined. Emergency calls were made for loans. Stocks and bonds were dumped upon the markets in such unprecedented quantities that the situation got out of control and the worst financial debacle the world ever witnessed resulted. Values to the extent of billions were destroyed in the shortest space of time and that disastrous financial storm, with all its devastating effects, fell with merciless severity over every section of the country.

Up to the present time we have only attempted to slacken the progress of this engine of destruction, but in this legislation we plan a bold but constructive remedy. The plan involved in this bill has been developed by Robert L. Owen, formerly a United States Senator from Oklahoma and chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee which drafted and sponsored the passage of the Federal reserve law. By this plan it is proposed to place the Federal reserve system back of the bonus payment and to make that system our Government's agency in paying this acknowledged debt to the veterans who are in possession of adjusted-service certificates. If the Federal reserve system weathered the tremendous strain in financing the World War, it will, I am sure, prove both a safe and dependable agency in carrying out the provisions of this bill. Under the Owen plan it is proposed that bonds of the United States Government shall be issued to the amount of the bonus, and that these bonds shall be turned over to the Federal reserve system, which in turn will issue Federal reserve notes in denominations suitable for paying the veterans. The Federal reserve system will at the same time keep in close touch with commodity prices.

They will have the power and the authority as the situation develops to sell Government bonds, the proceeds of which will be used to retire the outstanding currency, this power extending to the point of authorizing it to sell all of the bonds in one offering if this procedure should be deemed advisable. Under this plan the Federal reserve system becomes a stabilizing and governing body to regulate the volume of currency, to keep it within proper limitations, and in that regard it differs from the original Patman proposal; it will not permit of uncontrolled expansion. Prof. Irving Fisher in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee explained that this was a perfectly sound method. I agree with him in that deflation or dollar swelling is not an act of God with a special mandate to baffle the human race. We do not have to wait for a happy accident to neutralize deflation. It may be neutralized by design. Man has control of his own currency, if he will use it. And this bill with the Owen amendment is designed to bring about this very situation.

RELIEF OUR MOST VITAL NEED

Aside from the contention that the bonus can be paid without taxing our people or without withdrawing money from the Treasury, there is a more important feature of the problem for Congress to consider. With 10,000,000 of our people out of work, including a great number of veterans, it occurs to me that the Government should supply them with work, or, failing to do this, the bonus becomes a necessary relief measure.

European countries are not as fortunate as we are in that their central governments have been contributing to unemployment relief for a number of years, and up to this late day our central government has frowned upon unemployment insurance and all other forms of direct relief.

The bonus army now encamped within the vicinity of the Capitol is composed of a splendid type of our citizenship. Men from nearly every walk of life can be found in their ranks. They are neither communists nor radicals, and they believe, and justly so, that they are within their constitutional rights in petitioning Congress for relief.

Some Members seem to resent the appearance of the veterans in the Capital at this time, but they have the same right to be here as those who represented the Anti-Saloon League when they forced a hesitant Congress to propose the eighteenth amendment and enact the Volstead law.

They are as much within their rights as the swarm of lobbyists that arrived in Washington when the recent tax and tariff legislation was considered. No one seemed to resent their coming, and no one has the right to resent the coming of any citizen while he remains within his rights as a citizen.

If the veterans are paid the bonus according to the Owen plan it is bound to have a beneficial effect upon general conditions throughout the country. It will be evenly spread in every community throughout the land and will be used in the payment of bills to grocers, butchers, druggists, landlords, doctors, and others. Expanding our currency within careful limits and controlled by the sound policy provided in the Owen plan will most certainly stimulate business and lessen the depression.

If Congress adjourns without approving a vast relief program which will provide for a proper expansion of the currency, direct relief for our destitute citizens, and a program of public and private works that will insure employment to large numbers of our jobless, it will not be doing its full duty to the people or the country.

Economists of note, experts on finance, students of currency, and even some in high places on the Federal Reserve Board and in the Treasury admit the soundness of the principle contained in the Owen plan, and if such is the case relief, as will be provided by the bonus not only to the veterans and their dependents but to legions all over the land, is an obligation we can not avoid.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, when the World War ended a deserved cash bonus was asked by the World War veteran. An insurance policy instead was given him, with the right to borrow on it; when 50 per cent was loaned him at a high rate of interest compounded the interest would eat up the balance. The Treasury makes millions of profit by this transaction. A class or a per cent can carry the policy without borrowing. The larger class are out of a job and walk the streets asking for work. The country is without sufficient money to meet business demands. Its money is hoarded, estimated to the extent of nine billions; values reduced, commodity prices down below the cost of production, credit gone, depression, and want of confidence abound. The country has been drained of its money by high finance and stock speculations, ending in the crash of 1929, encouraged by those in control.

Something must be done to relieve this condition. Under the Federal Constitution, the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof is a fundamental right and duty. New blood—a larger circulating medium—is a necessity. The adjusted-service certificate is as much an obligation of the Government as its bonded debts. Hoarded money will not come out of hiding, except for investment in tax-exempt securities.

Ex-Senator Robert L. Owen, a former national banker and coauthor of the Federal reserve system, suggested an amendment to the Patman bill to relieve the condition of distress. On extensive hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, the accepted Owen plan was deemed by eminent economists to be feasible, safe and sound—and the issue of additional currency backed by the credit of the Government and the gold reserve—and based on Government bonds to be held by the Federal reserve banks and the currency controlled thereby—and the outstanding so-called bonus certificates paid off—and the country relieved by new money—helpful to business and small banks everywhere—and a distressed condition ended.

Then the hoarded money will come out of hiding and business will revive and depression end, the high-priced hidden dollar will no longer control, commodity prices will rise, an emergency will have been met and justice done, and more completely done with lowered tariff walls and a change of Federal administration. Relief must come under the powers fully granted under the Constitution or ruin will follow in the wake of a centralization of power, warned against by Jefferson, who believed in the right of the people to control the dollar and not the dollar the man.

Place human rights above the sordid dollar, which flees like a coward into hiding in times of distress, and which seeks to control the Government and its agencies for profit by deflating the currency and enhancing the value of the gold dollar—by making the dollar the master rather than the servant of mankind and its business. Remember the immortal utterances of Bryan who proclaimed the rights of man. Read again the minority report of Kitchin and Crisp, Oldfield, Carew, and Tague on the soldiers' adjusted-service certificate, filed March 30, 1922, when this so-called adjusted-service certificate was substituted for the cash bonus.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION—WHAT THE DEMOCRATS PROPOSED

March 20, 1922, the following-named Democrats, members of the Ways and Means Committee, filed a minority report which contained the following statements (67th Cong., 2d sess., Rept. No. 804, pt. 3):

In justice to the Democrats of the committee and of the House who shall vote for the bill, it must be remembered that no Democratic member of the committee was permitted to participate at any meeting either in the discussion or preparation of the bill, nor was any Democratic member allowed even to be present at any meeting for the discussion or consideration of the bill, so this bill is exclusively a barred-door Republican product.

We are confident that if the Democrats had control of the committee and the writing of a bonus bill was committed by the House to their charge, they would have prepared and presented to Congress a bill far more just and satisfactory to both the veteran and the Government."

The duebill, rain-check, borrow-money bonus mode of payment, as provided by the bill, is an insult to every World War veteran and a shameful discredit to Congress and the Nation. By the bill the veteran is given a scrap of paper and told to go out and hawk it from bank to bank in the hope, after being held up for a high rate of interest, of getting a little cash on it, not, however, to exceed 50 per cent of what the bill confesses the Government now justly owes him.

If the Government justly owes the veteran an additional compensation, as the bill admits, why should it not treat him as it does its other current creditors—pay him on demand in cash? When our country needed his services and required of him sufferings and sacrifices of blood, limb, and life, he went, and willingly, at once. He did not demand an installment plan or delay of 20 years for his services and sacrifices.

We are unalterably opposed to this Harding-Mellon money-power scheme. Treat "the boys" white, gentlemen of the Republican Congress. If you really favor the money bonus, pay them, like men, in cash in full, and do not send them out of the Capitol with only scraps of paper as tramping mendicants at the mercy of the banks in our towns and cities. During the war he treated you and your country "white." He now deserves fair, manly treatment at your hands.

The Republicans ask, How can we get the cash now to pay? We answer: Exactly as we have been getting the cash to run the Government for the last five years. Exactly as the Republicans got the cash to pay $3,000,000,000 to the war contractors, two billions to give and loan to the railroads for the benefit of the holders of railroad securities, fifty million for the war-minerals contractors, millions to feed Europe, and exactly as they propose to raise millions for the purpose of paying a ship subsidy.

When his country called he offered life and limb. What do you now offer him—a "gold brick"?

PETER F. TAGUE.

The unnatural condition existing in our country is due to those in high authority and those who have controlled the Government, and who now ask from the Government billions of money in loans to save them from impending disaster. Let us get at the root of the evil and save humanity from ruin, so that government of and for the people may live and civilization be preserved. The hoarded high-priced and hidden gold dollar will not give life to the Nation. Agriculture that gives annual added millions of wealth to the country must be protected and encouraged, or want and depression will not end. The necessities of life and the heartbeat of the Nation for relief and justice must be heard, and sordid greed for more profit and a domination of Government and its agencies for selfish ends must yield to the demands of humanity or history will repeat itself, and our civilization will fall as Rome fell in ancient days.

Mr. Speaker, I insert here the Owen amendment, as offered by Mr. RAGON:

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGON: Strike out all of section 2 of the bill, commencing on page 4, line 17, down to and including line 2 on page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

"He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

"He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

"These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

"Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for these notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation."

Remember that currency and coins bearing the stamp of the Government are measures of value, made so by law, and mediums of exchange of the necessities and comforts of life, which constitute the real wealth of the country. The corn, wheat, cotton, cattle, and hogs, and other products of farm and factory constitute this wealth. But the dollar to-day, the medium of exchange, has become the master, while real wealth, that constitutes the necessities of life, is under control. The Government, under the Constitution, can furnish the relief. Will the governing power permit it? If not, more taxes, less incomes, and increasing indebtedness, and less hope for the future. In shrunken values the wealth of the United States before the crash of 1929, estimated at three hundred and ninety billions, has fallen to an estimate of two hundred and fifty billions and burdened by debt—the loss due largely as a result of stock speculations, estimated above sixty billions; also to loans and investments abroad that bring no return, to hoarded money withdrawn from industry. No suggested remedy except to wait Micawber-like for something to turn up, while special interests seek to increase their hold on the country and cry out against any currency relief where most needed.

Those loudest in opposition to this relief are among the class who reaped large profits under war conditions when prices were high and to whom millions of dollars were refunded of income taxes, in the aggregate over $3,000,000,000. This is the class who rush to buy tax-exempt securities and loan and invest abroad, and urge cancellation of foreign loans due the United States, so their private loans may be enhanced in value, and cry aloud against fiat money when they know that the money sought to be issued under the Owen plan is backed by the bonds of the United States and the gold held in the Treasury and the Federal reserve banks and of like value in kind as other moneys now in circulation and exchangeable for gold notes.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, there comes a time in the life of every public servant when it is necessary to choose between the thing you would like to do and the thing that you know you should do.

I know of no case since I have been in Congress where to do the thing that I believe to be right hurts me as much as it does to-day, to vote against the bonus at this time.

I have not forgotten the service performed by the youth of our country when they answered the call that to many of them meant death and to others a life of illness and misery. I am thinking of those men to-day and the many other thousands who shall within the next few years pass on to join the ranks of those who have made the supreme sacrifice.

It is because of these thoughts and my convictions that I can not vote "aye" on H. R. 1, otherwise known as the "bonus bill." I truly believe that it would not only alienate the rank and file of the people of this country who have heretofore supported legislation to benefit the veterans; but it would be a real tragedy, for up to now the veterans have had the great majority of citizens in sympathy with their cause.

It would also be a great injustice to the wives and children of men whose only asset, in the event of death, is the adjusted compensation granted by the Government—known as the bonus but in reality an insurance upon their lives. In the event of the death of a veteran at any time this compensation is paid in full to his nearest dependents.

In reviewing many of my cases in the Veterans' Bureau, my attention has been called to the fact that thousands of veterans die without a dollar to defray even their funeral expenses, and if it were not for this adjusted compensation or life insurance awaiting the dependents, the $100 provided by law, as we all know, would be insufficient to pay for even the most ordinary funeral. It would mean that the widow of the veteran would probably be in debt for years for the funeral expenses of her husband.

Another reason for my voting in opposition to this bill to-day, is that at a time like this, when Congress has been obliged to levy high taxes in order to balance the Budget, and letters are pouring in from all classes of Americans begging for help, it seems neither right nor proper that we should place a price on patriotism.

Many of these citizens who are now on the verge of starvation were among those who in 1917 and 1918 contributed to the Red Cross, worked day and night without any compensation to assist the men who had gone to war, bought Liberty bonds, and made every kind of sacrifice. I do not mean by this to minimize the noble work done by the veterans, whose devotion to their country was, and is, and always shall be appreciated.

I merely wish to call attention to the fact that they were not the only heroes of the war, nor do I believe that these heroes are represented by the men who have come to Washington to demand from the Treasury money that is not theirs.

We can not legislate for any one class, and in view of the 8,000,000 men who were not veterans but who are out of employment and on the verge of starvation, this surely would be class legislation. The great danger of this "bonus bill" is that it might repeal much of the legislation that has taken us years to enact for the benefit of the veterans and their dependents.

The thing that should be done quickly and without quibbling is for Congress to pass a proper public works bill to benefit all classes.

Americans want work, not charity. I can not and will not believe that the patriotic soldier who offered his services to his country would expect or wish to be singled out as a class apart and embarrass the country he defended by insisting upon the payment of a debt at this time, when it is not and will not be due until 1945.

For the sick or disabled veterans we are doing and shall continue to do everything within our power; but this does not apply to the man who has no service disability and is merely insisting that he be paid now, with interest, a sum of money that the Government contracted to pay him in 1945. Such a demand is unjust and not patriotic.

I have too much faith in our veterans to believe that any large number are in favor of paying something that might destroy the credit of the country they fought to defend. When and if the bonus is paid, I want it paid in real dollars. The Patman bill proposes to pay the soldiers by turning the printing presses loose. I do not want the bonus paid in depreciated currency, so that when the veteran thinks he is getting a dollar worth 100 cents he will find he is getting one worth 50 or 75 cents. It is merely handing a gold brick to the soldiers and a much larger gold brick to the millions of Americans who are not soldiers and would not receive any bonus money, but who would find that the purchasing power of the dollars they managed to acquire by toil and honest effort would be sadly diminished by this uncontrolled flood of fiat money issued from the printing presses.

The adjournment of Congress is only a short time away. It will be unfortunate if something is not done by this Congress to bring relief to the men and women in the common walks of life who are unemployed, starving, and sorely distressed. Fully 75 per cent of the enormous volume of mail that comes to my office is from people who plead for help. My heart goes out in unbounded sympathy to them, and I believe some relief bill should be passed.

My record in Congress with regard to veterans' legislation is well known. I have been and shall continue to be their loyal friend. I could not conscientiously consider myself such if I voted for this bill. It would be an expedient vote, not an honest one.

I ask the veterans of New Jersey to trust me now as they did when I promised in my first term in Congress that I would not rest until a hospital in New Jersey for the disabled veterans had been secured. I have kept faith with them.

Mr. LICHTENWALNER. Mr. Speaker, after listening to every argument for and against the payment of the adjusted-service certificates held by the veterans of the World War with an open mind I have concluded to vote for the bill.

In coming to this decision I wish it distinctly understood that I am doing so without having been influenced in any way by those of the veterans who have come to Washington to try and influence the Members of Congress to vote for the bill. The men who are here from my district represent the very best type of World War veteran in this country.

I understand that the contingent from my district in their encampment are a model for the entire army at Anacostia; that the discipline in that outfit is the same as in war time; that no liquor is tolerated in the camp; that anyone coming into the camp under the influence of liquor is ejected immediately; that anyone preaching communistic doctrine is not only forcibly removed but also handed over to the police authorities so he will be sent out of the city. In short, our boys by their example have won the respect and admiration of the entire encampment.

I do not know whether this army of men here in Washington has helped their cause or not. I do know that these men, by the fine manner in which they have conducted themselves and by their splendid parade here the other evening, in a city which, fortunately, is not faced by the terrible conditions prevailing in the rest of the country, and therefore not as conversant with the hardships undergone in the other communities, have converted the people of the District of Columbia to a sympathetic understanding of their cause. I do think that whatever the results of this vote may be, that if the vote should or should not be favorable in the Senate, that this army of men should then return to their homes and not subject the people here to the dangers of disease and themselves to the certainty of an epidemic, and thereby undo all the good they may have accomplished for the benefit of veterans in general.

After this problem has been disposed of I think the men would certainly be better off at home, where at least at the very worst they are not subjected to the rigors of camp life and of sleeping on the ground.

The men who have called on me have not tried in any way to coerce me on my vote, or even to influence me. I have told them that I would listen to the debate with an open mind; that I would not allow any political consideration to affect my judgment; that while I had received hundreds of letters and telegrams urging my support of the pending bill, and a comparatively few communications against it, that I had given the same reply to all of them. I further informed the delegations that called on me that I was most sympathetic to their cause, but that I would vote for the cash payment of the bonus only if I could be convinced that it would not injure the credit of the Government of the United States of which they and I are a part.

After most careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that it not only would not be detrimental to our credit but would be a means of bringing back the business of our country by circulation of the money, which would not be hoarded.

I have gladly voted for every measure that I thought would bring back business. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, which was enacted to provide loans up to $2,000,000,000 to banks, railroads, and insurance companies; the Glass-Steagall bill, which I hoped would loosen up the credit situation; the Federal farm loan bill, for extension of credits. While I think these measures have had a good effect by stopping the wholesale closing of banks, yet they have not given employment to a single person. Business, instead of being on the upgrade, as we all hoped it would be, is at the lowest ebb now that it has been at any time since the beginning of the depression; and instead of more people being employed than there were when we convened in session of Congress in December, there are now several millions more out of employment.

Since there seems to be no prospect of a large public-works program of several billion of dollars being provided, a policy which would give employment to a great many people and a plan which would give work rather than charity to those who desired to work—I might say here that these millions of men want to work and feel that there is something wrong with a system where in a land of plenty they can not obtain jobs to provide a living for their families.

I believe that something should be done to at least in some measure bring back business, which would also indirectly give employment. I do not claim to be an authority on the subject of economics, but after some study of it I believe that some inflation of the currency at this time, which would force a rise in commodity prices, would, within limits, of course, be the most desirable result which could be brought about at this time. How can we expect to get back to any degree of prosperity when almost everything we are making is being sold at less than the cost of production?

We have been forced in a spirit of patriotism to vote for a tax bill which will place on the backs of the people a most onerous burden in order to make the receipts of the Government equal to the expenses, and this after the cutting of hundreds of millions of dollars from the estimates of appropriations as submitted by the Bureau of the Budget. Yet even with the heavy burdens we have placed on the people by this revenue act, the Budget will not be balanced if business does not soon return to a more stable condition.

I know all the arguments against the cash payment of the bonus, the principal one being that the certificates are not due until 1945. The Government, though, has revised other debts in favor of the peoples of other nations. If the men were to receive their $1 a day for service at home and the one dollar and a quarter a day for foreign service, which is the basis of the certificates, dating from the close of the war, with the interest at a rate that they had to pay for borrowing money, the full amount of the certificates would have been due in 1931.

Yesterday our good friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK], than whom I held no man in this House in greater esteem for his character and for his opinions, was stricken while making the greatest plea for the bonus that has been made on this floor. His last words were: "But, Mr. Chairman, I want to divert from the sordid. We hear nothing but dollars here. I want to go from the sordid side." It may be that seeing this noble man fall to the floor dead, passing away as many of us would like to do, in the performance of our patriotic duty—it may be that seeing the admirable way in which the 18,000 men who are here in Washington pleading for the bonus have conducted themselves has affected some of our sympathies when we shall cast our vote, but after all, if we as a nation should turn from the "sordid side" and bring relief to those in distress that would affect favorably the conditions of all of the people, I for one am glad to cast my vote for that cause.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I favor paying the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates in cash. These certificates were not a bonus. They were a debt that our Government has confessed to be due the ex-soldier for adjusted pay, based upon service rendered. The adjusted-service certificate is not, and was not, intended as a reward for patriotism. Our Government admitted that we owed a debt to each ex-soldier equal to $1 additional per day for each day of home service and $1.25 additional per day for each day of overseas service. The issuance of these certificates was an attempt on the part of Congress to equalize the amount the soldier received with what others received who were not in the military service.

Congress in 1924 passed what is commonly known as the adjusted compensation or bonus act. After the war Congress adjusted the pay of the railroads to the amount of $1,600,000,000; we adjusted the pay of the war contractors to the amount of $2,000,000,000. We did not ask them to take adjusted-service certificates. Under the foreign-debt settlements we canceled approximately $11,000,000,000 owed to us by foreign countries. I believe the ex-service men have the same right to the payment of their adjusted-service certificates in cash as the railroads and war contractors, who made enormous profits out of the war. Our soldiers hold the Government's duebill; the obligation is just; they need the money. Those who do not want their certificates paid in cash can keep them in the present form. They would not be compelled to cash their certificates.

I am supporting this legislation to-day upon the theory that it was due and owing to our ex-service men for their loyalty in the hour of need. I am supporting this measure upon the broader basis that it is a relief measure which would help to take care of serious economic conditions; that it will help relieve distress and suffering in all corners of our land. I am supporting this measure in the firm belief that beneficial results will flow from it in restoring prosperity to the distressed of our Nation.

I have consistently supported the payment in cash of these adjusted-service certificates. I have previously taken up the cause of the disabled veteran, in whom I have always been deeply interested, and have insisted upon a cash payment to them. According to the best information obtainable, from Director Shaw of the veterans' employment service, Department of Labor, 1,600,000 veterans, who are unemployed and absolutely destitute, need their money at this time. These certificates do not represent a bonus or gift, they represent an honest debt admitted by Congress to be due and owing to our soldiers who are the safeguards of our Nation and the defenders of our flag.

The cry goes up, Where are we going to get the money to pay? The facts and figures disclose the story. Experts tell us that there is enough idle gold in the Treasury to authorize issuance of Treasury notes to pay this debt in full. In this way the debt can be paid without a bond issue, without increasing taxes, and without additional interest. The debt must be paid sometime—everyone will be helped by payment now. The question becomes this, Which will help more and promote the general welfare of all our people of this great Nation more, the payment of this money now or permit the banks to consume it by compound interest? It is estimated that payment at this time will distribute $18 per capita over the entire Nation.

The money will be paid quickly without graft, additional taxes, or favoritism, and the people in every city, county, and State in the Union will get their proportionate share. The money will go to patriotic American citizens. Purchasing power will be placed in the hands of consumers, and the money will be spent at home for clothing, food, and fuel, thereby promoting production and employment. Cash payment now will convert a noncirculating Government obligation (adjusted-service certificate) into a circulating Government obligation (Treasury note). We want justice for our veterans, but that alone is not enough; we want justice for all our people. We want a fair price for corn, cotton, wheat, hogs, and other agricultural products; and we want a fair living wage for our workmen, our merchants, and our business and professional men and women. Honestly owed money in circulation will in part effect this very thing and will set in motion the idle wheels of industry and stagnant business and raise (to a higher level) farm commodity prices somewhere near the value of the dollar. We need to enable debtors to pay creditors. We must raise the price level—by increasing circulating medium, or by increasing its activity, in other words, reduce hoarding. Payment of adjusted-service certificates will accomplish this.

My State alone would receive $117,845,937.81. My congressional district alone would be benefited in the amount of $2,983,622.13. The following table will show the actual amounts by counties:

Ross County	$801,059.13
Fairfield County	780,297.30
Perry County	557,519.85
Pickaway County	482,929.74
Hocking County	361,816.11

If we can not furnish jobs—pay the bonus, which is an obligation any way. Give the 3,600,000 soldiers, scattered in all corners of our Nation, the money due and owing them. The payment of money in Treasury notes will not take one cent from the Treasury—will not levy any additional taxes—will not float any bonds. Payment would start business moving. Payment would be money spent for shoes, clothing, food, and payment of debts. Price levels would be raised by increased circulating medium or by increasing its activity.

What the country in general needs is not money in hundreds of millions put away in bank vaults, but money scattered all over the country to start again the circulation of trade. The country needs money that will be spent, not accumulated. Would not the spending of this money by 3,600,000 men start everything moving?

Those who would now look upon the jobless veterans as a needless burden were among the first to cheer them on their way "across the pond." Then they were well fed, well dressed, well disciplined. To-day, these same boys are poorly dressed, hungry and without jobs, but still patriotic, well-behaved, fine boys. We were proud of our boys in 1917—why not express it to them now?

Our soldiers are the defenders of our Nation. Whatever we enjoy to-day of life, liberty, and happiness we owe to these heroic men and women. Compensation paid them for their disabilities is not charity. Our Government can not restore the life given in the service of our country, but it has a duty to help comfort the mother, the widow, and the orphan. Our Government can not restore health to the body broken in defense of our flag. It can in a measure lessen the suffering, the hardship, the sickness of our disabled by providing liberally and cheerfully for those who have given the best they had to their country in the hour of need.

Pay the bonus in cash now.

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, the payment of the adjusted certificates, commonly called the bonus, has been given much study by myself long before I even came to Washington for the present session of Congress; and, in fact, in a way my views were expressed at my home, Bedford, Ind., November 19, 1931, and those remarks were entered in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 7, 1932, at the request of the Hon. ARTHUR GREENWOOD. I have no apology to make for my stand. Why should I offer an apology? The Sixty-seventh Congress, in March, 1922, acknowledged this debt and acknowledged that it was for service rendered during the war, several years before that date. Other institutions who called upon Congress for a bonus, such as the railroads, manufacturing interests, and so forth, and adjustments were made with them, and they were not paid with checks due in 1945, but paid in cash.

Some years after the war ended, certain large interests in the country convinced the Government that they had overpaid in income taxes and they were promptly paid the amount said to be due them at that time and they were paid 6 per cent interest from the time they had paid the money to the Government up until the time they were reimbursed. When the bonus certificates were first issued it was said, in some parts of the United States, that the veterans had to pay as high as 8 per cent to borrow money on their own certificates and to borrow the money that was already due them, and long past due.

TEN BILLION DOLLAR BONUS TO EUROPE

Our splendid country has gone much further than that in giving a bonus. When the war was ended, a war into which we were dragged to save the faces of certain countries of Europe and when they were fighting with their backs to the wall, we stepped in with our billions of dollars of gold and hundreds of billions of natural and other resources. Many thousands and even millions of people of the United States profited, some to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars on account of the war. We sold Liberty bonds, thrift stamps, and so forth, and the slogan was "to give until it hurts."

In selling these bonds I was told to tell the citizens that Europe was to pay us dollar for dollar and that they were to pay interest on same, but what happened? When the war was over, those countries, with the nerve that they are known to have, asked us to pare down and we did and gave them a bonus of some $10,000,000,000, and on the remaining approximately $10,000,000,000, the Government very obligingly gave them terms of settlement ranging in different countries from 1⅛ per cent up to the highest which is 3½ per cent, and this was another bonus. Then we gave another bonus to Europe last year when their agents together with the international bankers of Wall Street, came to the President wringing their hands and asked for a moratorium.

In that war who was sent? It was the flower of the manhood of this country. Not the boys who were crippled, defective eyesight, sick, and so forth, but the choice young men who had a future. They were taken from all that was dear and near to them, and they spent their time training in camps, and clothed by Uncle Sam, to be sure, and all for $1 a day on this side and $1.25 a day on the other side. Some say they had better jobs than they ever had in their lives, but did they?

They did not all get over, but there were not any who knew that they would not be sent across. Let us see what kind of a good job those who went over had. Well, they had the beautiful dugouts and trenches to live and sleep in which were infested with rats, vermin, and so forth. They had the opportunity of going over the top to be riddled with machine-gun fire and to breathe poison gases, and all for $1.25 a day. While those on this side who were not physically able, or were too young or too old to go, were drawing salaries from $3 up to $18 per day at home. They were living in safety and comfort. The big operators were making war material and piling up huge fortunes. Whether right or wrong, our Government, all three branches, decided that the boys were entitled to additional pay; they acknowledged that, but when they did there was no reason in the world, not any substantial one, why they should not have been paid that additional sum at the time that they acknowledged the debt, and there is no reason that I know of why it should not have been started and have been dated at least at the time of signing the armistice, or when the boys were mustered out of service, and the same amount should have borne interest at the rate of the man who overpaid his income tax, that to be added to the amount due them and all paid at once.

We find some very fine gentlemen in Congress that have established splendid records, some of them overseas men perhaps, in the thickest of some of the battles. They all have my respect and I am for them and I would not detract, if I could, any of the glory due them. Some of them, however, have said that paying the bonus is very unjust and that the veterans are not entitled to it, and many such statements, but these men have sufficient means to take care of themselves and their families. They are also men who are now drawing nice salaries as Congressmen from the Federal Government and there are some who are also drawing a handsome retired officers' pay. However, I do not begrudge them of it and I am not opposing it; neither am I considering that; but with the retired officers' pay plus their salaries, I doubt if they can realize the suffering of many of the veterans.

At this date a good many thousands of the veterans are in Washington. Their being here has not changed in any way my mind concerning paying the bonus; in fact, it has convinced me more thoroughly that I was right in being for the bonus, even more than I was before they came here.

A better-behaved and more orderly group of men, in my opinion, have never marched through the city. Sure, some reds took advantage of the situation and came to Washington—probably some of them were already here—but the veterans promptly threw them out of their camps when they were found and reported them to the police. Considerable talk has gone around questioning the right of these veterans' coming to Washington. Why should they not come here, when they are unemployed and have been for months, some for a year or more, and their families hungry? What group of men, I wonder, would have any more right than these veterans to come to Washington and ask for in a gentleman's way what they think is due them, and what is due them? Other groups come here. The big interests send their groups here, and many have received what they came for. One big difference, however—they stay at the best hotels, have fine clothes, and make good money, and they represent in most part the big interests of the country. It is true we have to have big interests, and conditions have arisen where something had to be done for them. I joined with the President in most of his program, which I thought would help these conditions in general, and I opposed his plans which I thought would not be for the best interest of the country. In my opinion, there is no group of men in this country who have more right to come to Washington, their Capital, and to ask for the things that they feel are due them, than these veterans.

BALANCE THE BUDGET

Out of 140 years, the Budget of this Nation has been out of balance 47 years, or approximately one-third of the time. Our Budget has never been balanced in times of war and in years of distress. While I was just as anxious as anyone could be to see the Budget balanced, yet, for the two preceding years one did not hear anything about balancing the Budget. This year it has been continually talked and the scare has been given the people that unless the Budget is balanced that there is no telling what would happen to the country. How much better it would have been if the Director of the Budget would have fulfilled his duty, made the necessary reduction of the expenses of the Government. Then, if the President had sent it to Congress, saying here is the amount that must be deduced from each branch of the Government, and forbidding the departments to have lobbyists around the Capitol, and had given the amount to be deducted from each department, leaving to Congress the right to make any additional deduction that it might find necessary in order to balance the Budget. Then the increase of income taxes to be derived from those who have profits, the Budget would have been balanced, or as nearly so as it will be when Congress adjourns, and the country saved all the turmoil it has endured.

But what does this program of paying the bonus have to do with balancing the Budget? It is an acknowledged debt for services performed during the war. Under the bill as passed by the House, it is to be handled by bonds issued by the Government, held by the Federal reserve bank, against which an issuance will be made, and same will pay any debts that any other money will pay, and would be just as good as the bonds the Government has issued to these veterans, because they will have the seal of the United States Government on them. At the present time the money in circulation in this country is approximately $15 below normal, and business is always bad when there is a shortage of money in circulation. There is much unwise and unsound talk that this money would be money with nothing back of it, which are not statements of fact. There is a certain amount of gold held by our Government which is lying idle in the vaults. Against this issue of currency and bonds could be placed 40 per cent of gold, which is all that is required to be up in gold against any issue of currency. In fact we have a certain amount of silver certificates and each of these silver certificates is backed by a silver dollar, and that dollar is to-day worth only 28 cents in real value; but who refuses to take a $1 bill and who would not like to have many of them? What store or bank would refuse them? None. Why? Because the seal of the United States Government is on them.

The payment of this bonus would reach every city, village, crossroad in every corner of the United States. There are more people idle in our country to-day than have ever been known before, and there is more suffering and hunger. Something has to be done to help the farmer and to aid the working people, and this bonus will go a long way toward helping everybody in the country. This money will not be wasted by the veterans as some people tell you and as some honestly believe. According to a statement made by General Hines of the Veterans Bureau, quite to the contrary happens. When the veterans received 50 per cent of this bonus, only 7 per cent was wasted, while 93 per cent went to pay grocery bills, payments on homes, autos, or to finish payment on homes, and so forth.

It is commonly said that a dollar paid to one person, pays nine others, and this bonus, if paid, would reach to every section of our country.

Something must be done in this country for the unemployed, of whom, it is estimated, the veterans comprise approximately 1,000,000. Means have got to be taken to either feed these hungry, starving people or give them jobs. Something must be done for the farmers. Up to this date, I am sorry to say, practically nothing has been done for them, and there must be something done for them. Relief to the farmer and relief to unemployment is the only way back to normal conditions.

Are the big interests going to continue to stand for themselves and to oppose the interest and welfare of the entire country, and are they not going to learn that the country is not and can not and never will be prosperous until the working men are supplied with jobs at more than a living wage and farmers given a market for their product with the opportunity to pay taxes and live?

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, much has been said on the floor of this House during the present session of Congress in regard to "patriotism, courage, and moral stamina" when such subjects as the revenue bill and the economy bill were discussed.

That, ladies and gentlemen of this House, has been the sum and substance of the courage displayed. There has been an utter lack of courage when it came to the matter of handling legislation that will serve to bring back prosperity, by restoring the even flow of money through the Nation, providing jobs for the jobless, relief for the farmer, and immediate succor for the starving people.

Instead of standing up and facing these problems boldly and patriotically, this House has shied away from them, evidently thinking that to balance the Budget is all that is needed.

Balancing the Budget is entirely a separate question. It should serve to restore confidence, but continued decline in the prices of commodities and stocks since the Budget-balancing performance has been completed has proven conclusively that much more is needed to even restore confidence of our own people in the ability of the Federal Government to cope with conditions such as threaten our very existence as a government of the people who are governed.

But that is beside the question now. Measures must be enacted at once if this Nation is not to be reduced entirely to a nation of subservient people.

Money must be made available to the people of ordinary means in normal times, who are the people that keep the money in circulation.

The guarantee of bank deposits has been a step in that direction in that it provides means of safeguarding the Nation's monetary system by insuring the even and uninterrupted flow of money after the flow has been reestablished.

It is my own personal belief that we are fortunate—and deeply fortunate—in having the means at hand for quickly placing into circulation more than $2,000,000,000. That can be done by paying the soldiers of the World War the debt we owe them. Thousands of these men are here in the National Capitol to-day begging Congress to permit them to aid in reviving prosperity. Pay them their money and we need have no fear that this two billions will be hoarded—at least not until it finds its way into the hands of the wealthy hoarders.

Pay them this money that they may go home to their wives and families and provide them with food and clothing and pay their creditors.

It is a sorry spectacle when Congress falters, fears to act, at a time like this, especially when such action is the action that is required to lift us from the mire of panic, distress, and take us back from the brink of national chaos.

Two billions of dollars put into circulation at once will turn over quickly. Each time it changes hands it pays either $2,000,000,000 worth of debts or buys $2,000,000,000 worth of the farmers' produce or the manufactured wares of the Nation's industries. If it changes hands only in normal routine the effect will be remarkable to behold.

Pay Veteran Jones his bonus and he will pay it over to his grocer, his landlord, his clothing merchant, and his doctor and others.

The grocer will pay it out to the wholesaler, the landlord will pay interest on his notes and doubtless spend some of it in improving his properties for his own protection. New paint, new roof, new wall paper will be bought. Many will buy new clothing, new radios, and perhaps new cars, and the money has gone on its way doing its part toward restoration of prosperity.

The clothing merchant will pay his bills, buy some new stocks, and perhaps at least pay off the interest on his notes. The money he receives goes on its way.

The doctor pays his drug bills, the interest he owes on his notes, and perhaps, if he can possibly do so, he will buy a new car to replace the one he has driven for two or three years. Perhaps the doctor will paint his home, buy his family some much-needed new clothing, and the money has again gone on its way.

Some of this money will quickly reach the farmer, and no one needs it more than he does. Some of it will quickly reach the producer of manufactured articles, enabling him to give work.

The farmer who gets the money will buy the things he needs, and keep the money flowing onward. The employee of the factory will not hoard it, either. His family has been in want too long to permit him to hoard any of it.

Two billions of dollars placed into circulation in this way now will turn over more times within a given period, and benefit more people, than ten billions in normal times. People who get it must keep it going through the regular channels of money flow. They have no alternative. They could not hoard it if they wanted to do so.

The stimulus to business this will provide will enable banks to extend new credits, further reviving the flow of money.

Payment of the bonus will greatly reduce the burden on charity and permit the money now being spent for the bare necessities of sustaining life in the unemployed and their families to go into other channels. It will send the money they would have to spend for that purpose traveling normally once more through the hands of the merchant and shopkeeper to the farmer and the producer of manufactured goods.

It will permit the entire Nation to take a new grasp on prosperity.

Coupled with the benefits to be derived from the enactment of the Garner relief measure, if this measure is not killed by a group of politicians playing politics with human misery, payment of the bonus and reopening of jobs to thousands by the unemployment relief to be given through the building program, it is our hope for reestablishing the possibility of American people again supporting themselves.

The only argument advanced against payment of the bonus is the argument that it will again unbalance the National Budget, increase the tax burden, and destroy confidence.

The first part of this argument is absurd. As long as we owe this debt, and refuse to liquidate it, our Budget is not balanced. But, considering that such was the truth, there is no reason why it should be. We have already established a bonus sinking fund, to be paid out in 1945. There is no reason advanced yet why we could not issue bonds or debentures secured by the bonus sinking fund without the necessity of increasing taxes one cent.

If you fear this, and there was no fear of bonds or indebtedness, or even of an unbalanced Budget, when our President extended a moratorium to European nations on their debt to us, last July, then there are other plans, some of which may be even better, for financing the bonus payment.

There was no fear of bonds when we fed 3,000,000 of these soldiers in Europe fighting in the World War. There was no fear of bonds when we extended ten thousand millions of dollars to foreign nations to help them finance—or in fact to finance their share of the World War. And we spoiled our possibilities of regaining much of this when our President extended a moratorium last summer to these debtors.

It was patriotism then. Why is it not patriotism now, when we do not have the destructive influence of war to contend with, to regain our courage and go forward?

Many plans aside from the above have been advanced for paying the bonus without unbalancing the Budget. Others, doubtless, could be devised, and collection of the war debt owing to us from foreign countries, which the moratorium has apparently prevented us from ever collecting, could have been one means.

As far as the section of the argument dealing with "destruction of confidence" is concerned, nothing could be more removed from the truth. The exact opposite would occur. New confidence would be aroused as the public was brought to realize that the Federal Government is in fact big enough to cope with such conditions as this—big enough to relieve distress and put the idle back to work.

In this panic, or in any other panic, there is no such thing as standing still. If we refuse to act to restore the wheels of industry, to feed the hungry and the distressed, we will continue to go backward. To date nothing has been done except to pass the Garner bill in the House—and that is threatened in the Senate and by the White House veto—to restore industry and feed the hungry.

A few weeks ago it was found to be an easy matter to secure $2,000,000,000 for the big banks and the big corporations who have wrecked themselves by their reckless gambling and who have dragged down others in their own ruin.

To-day we face the spectacle of Congress claiming that two billions can not be found to pay this just debt to the soldiers and at the same time take one mighty long stride toward restoring prosperity.

Putting it bluntly, men who are afraid to tackle this kind of a job have no place in Congress. The future is brilliant if we have the courage and vision to go forward. It is worse than gloomy, it is mighty dark, if we stand idly by in this time of distress and refuse to take advantage of the simple expedients at our command to restore prosperity through reviving the flow of money.

This Nation was not built by men with hearts afraid. It did not grow out of the Revolution under leadership of men who shrank from duty. It did not recover from the Civil War under the leadership of men afraid to act decisively, nor will it recover from our present panic until we move forward boldly and with the determination that the task can be done.

No one favors economy more than I. No one opposes needless Federal appropriations more sincerely. But this is not a question of saving dollars; it is a question of saving the entire Nation from ruin, and saving thousands from death by starvation and deprivation.

We can have economy, tax reduction, and the curtailment of waste of public funds and at the same time produce the money we must have to revive business and save the Nation and its people.

While we should rejoice that we do not have a conflict with other nations at war, we must realize that we are threatened by an even more sinister, more destructive, and horrible enemy to-day. Unemployment, hunger, want, and starvation stalking the land and reaching a grim hand into every section of the country constitute a far more deadly menace than war between nations. In war the spirit of patriotic nationalism arises. In panic this spirit, vital to the welfare of the Nation, is crushed, and the very foundations of democracy are attacked.

Patriotism, courage, and moral stamina must be displayed by the men in government if this disease or plague gnawing at our very vitals is not to be spread to all the people.

Let us act now before it is too late. Pay the bonus and go forward. Send the thousands of former soldiers who have come here to plead with us back to their families bearing a message of cheer and the knowledge that the Government they offered their very lives to defend will at least make an effort to save them now from starvation.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the so-called Patman bill provides for the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the veterans of the World War. These certificates will not be due until 1945, and the unearned interest amounts to $1,353,000,000. The title to the original bill was to provide for the immediate payment of the certificates. The title to the substitute, embodying the so-called Owen amendment, is to provide for controlled expansion of the currency and the payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates, which is about $773,000,000 more than their actual or loan value. Reasonable expansion is desirable, but it is worse than fallacy to say that it can be provided by the Patman bill. It is unthinkable to say that the Government can issue $2,400,000,000 in currency to pay the veterans and not be able to do the same thing to relieve the taxpayers.

The revenue act of 1932 imposes additional taxes upon the citizens of the United States in excess of $1,000,000,000. The Nation is now in distress. All citizens and all classes should be treated alike. If the currency could be expanded to pay the bonus, it could certainly more justifiably be expanded to pay the expenses of government. Taxpayers are being burdened as never before, and all taxpayers should be relieved.

Many veterans are laboring under a misapprehension. Many of them have come to Washington thinking that their certificates are due. The Government owes nothing to any able-bodied veteran on his certificate until 1945. I have always maintained that the bonus when granted should have been paid in cash, but the depleted Treasury will not permit payment at the present time. Many veterans have been misled. They have been told that Congress has voted to give $2,000,000,000 to banks, railroads, and insurance companies through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but such is not the case. Banks were in difficulties. When banks fail, citizens are in distress. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation merely provides loans on adequate security, and they are to be repaid. Such loans have been provided for farmers as well as bankers.

It is argued that $2,400,000,000 would be widely distributed. If the argument is sound and if a distribution of money will solve the depression, much more good would be accomplished by distributing $2,400,000,000 among the entire population. All would then be treated equally. If loans for 50 per cent of the value of the certificates in 1931 did not help the depression, surely the payment in full can not cure the depression. Reckless borrowings by individuals and governments lead inevitably to bankruptcy.

The bill provided for the United States to issue currency. By substituting the so-called Owen amendment, to provide for the issuance of bonds, the fallacy was confessed. The unsoundness of the original bill was admitted, but the Owen substitute is no better. It is nothing more nor less than an additional burden upon taxpayers of the United States at a time when they are least able to pay. Sinking funds must be provided, and interest must be paid.

I have gladly supported all measures in behalf of the disabled and wounded veterans and their dependents. I have supported legislation for the beneficiaries and dependents of veterans who lost their lives.

The United States has been most generous with its soldiers and sailors. Approximately 25 per cent of all Federal revenues are expended for their benefit. I am a friend of the ex-service man; but when we are undertaking to curtail governmental expenses, when we are undertaking to put the country on a pay-as-you-go basis, a grave injustice would be done the taxpayer by increasing his burdens. Moreover, the demand for the bonus will probably further delay legislation for the worthy widows and dependent children of veterans who sacrificed all for their country.

The United States is doing more for its veterans than all other so-called great nations combined. During the World War the United States mobilized 4,757,240 men and lost in dead and wounded 322,497, while the appropriations for the fiscal year 1932 for World War veterans and their dependents aggregated $860,635,000. Germany mobilized 13,000,000 men, lost 6,111,862, and the expenditures for the year 1932 were $298,690,000. France mobilized 8,410,000 men, lost 5,623,000, and the expenditures for 1932 were $286,722,000. Great Britain mobilized 6,600,000 men, lost 3,000,000, and expenditures for the year 1932 were $174,802,000. Italy mobilized 5,615,000 men, lost 1,597,000, and expended in 1932 $69,853,300; and Canada mobilized 619,636 men, lost 232,045, and expenditures for 1932 were $61,123,000.

It will be seen that the United States, with 322,497 in killed and wounded, is expending approximately as much for the veterans of the World War and their dependents annually as Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Canada combined, with more than 16,000,000 killed and wounded, are expending. The veterans are receiving $860,000,000 annually, and in the existing depression are thus probably better off than any other cross section of the population of the United States.

It is said that during the Civil War the Government issued greenbacks, but they were not satisfactory. It is folly to repeat mistakes. The soldiers are entitled to be paid in full for their certificates at maturity. The greenbacks of the Civil War became worth 38 cents on the dollar. We should not deceive veterans of the World War. It is entirely probable that the so-called currency for which the pending bill provides would depreciate so that veterans would be discriminated against. Greenbacks were never satisfactory until their redemption became interchangeable with other currencies.

There will not be a return to normal times or prosperous conditions until commodity prices increase. This means that there must be a reasonable expansion of the currency. I gladly promoted the Goldsborough bill and the Glass-Steagall bill, to provide for such expansion, but unreasonable inflation leads to a debased currency. We have the experiences of Germany in the use of the printing press following the World War. When the currency is debased, the laboring man is the first to suffer. His purchasing power is reduced.

To pass this bill would increase the tax burdens and further retard the recovery of the Nation. Unemployment would increase and a return to prosperity would be long delayed.

There is now $900,000,000 more currency outstanding than in 1929. The need is trade and commerce. There must be a turnover of currency and credits. The need is for the velocity of currency. Silver has declined, but that is no reason for issuing more silver certificates. There is better reason for acquiring additional silver bullion and coining additional silver dollars. There is better reason for the Government acquiring more silver for the issuance of more silver certificates.

The need is the restoration of confidence. I can think of nothing that would retard the economic recovery of the Nation more than the issuance of $2,400,000,000 in fiat money. We need greater confidence in both our currency and our Government.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under general leave granted Members to extend their remarks, I wish to place in the RECORD my views upon the bonus bill.

It was my intention to do this on the floor of the House, but in view of the short time allowed for general debate, I felt that my colleagues who served in the World War should be granted preference in the general debate on the floor of the House, and therefore yielded them the time that was allotted to me for general discussion.

The scenes in Washington for the past several days have brought sorrow and regret to those of us who were here in 1917 and 1918.

The scenes down on Pennsylvania Avenue leading from the White House to the Capitol are different now.

In 1917 the boys from all parts of the United States, clad in bright and new uniforms, with playing bands and flying flags, were cheered lustily by thousands and thousands of people as they marched along the Avenue and on by the White House to be reviewed by Woodrow Wilson, the great war President of these United States.

To-day it is different down on the Avenue. In abandoned buildings that are waiting to be torn down will be found hundreds and thousands of ex-service men now in Washington endeavoring to persuade Congress to mature their adjusted-compensation certificates that will be due in 1945 and to pay them now.

In this they are not asking any more than the Government has been doing for others. We are told that the Government has matured and paid ahead of time over $4,000,000,000 of the public debt.

If this had not been done, there would have been no deficit in the Treasury. And there would not have been any need of this hue and cry to balance the Budget and increase taxes. But instead of a deficit of over $2,000,000,000 the Budget would actually not only be balanced but there would be a surplus in the Treasury of something like $2,000,000,000 or more.

May I say that in my opinion there is more misunderstanding and misrepresentation about the bonus bill than any legislation that has been before the House of Representatives during my time as a Member of this honorable body.

You would think from some of the speeches that have been made in Congress, and some of the articles appearing in the press of the country that the proposed legislation was to make a donation or gift of some kind to the soldiers of the World War. Such an impression is so erroneous that it could easily be classed as untrue.

SOLDIERS NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR

It should forever be remembered that the ex-service men of this country were in no manner responsible for our entry into the World War.

It was the Congress of the United States acting in accord with a special message delivered in person by President Woodrow Wilson that declared a state of war to exist between the United States of America and the Imperial German Government.

It was Congress that passed the draft law that called four and one-half million of America's best men to arms and clad them in uniforms, put rifles in their hands, and sent them to the battlefields of France.

A GREAT ARMY

No one will deny that any greater army or better, braver, and truer soldiers ever walked this earth than the veterans of the World War.

BONUS IS ALLOWANCE

The soldiers' bonus is nothing more or less than an allowance by the Government of additional pay to what the soldiers received while in the service, and was never intended by Congress to be considered as a gift or gratuity on the part of the Government.

It will be remembered that the private soldier during the war received only $1 per day—$30 per month—for his services in this country and $1.10 per day—$33 per month—for his services while in foreign lands, while those not in the service received the highest wages ever paid in the history of our country.

After the war was over and the armistice had been signed and the boys began to return home, it was found that many of them, while they expected to return to their former positions, found that in many instances they had been filled by others, and they were left without jobs.

So that Congress decided that in view of the fact that nearly everybody except the soldiers themselves had made money out of the war, that the soldier who had offered his life as a living sacrifice in defense of his country, should receive more compensation than was allowed him at the time of his enlistment.

DEATH CERTIFICATE

Therefore, Congress passed the ex-service man's adjusted compensation act, now usually referred to as the bonus bill, by the terms of which each soldier was allowed additional compensation for each day's service rendered, of $1 per day for time served in the United States and $1.25 per day for time served in foreign countries.

And upon this basic pay there was executed to him what was known as an adjusted-compensation certificate, due and payable 20 years after date of its issuance, or in 1945. This was not satisfactory to the ex-service men at the time and never has been.

Many of them have referred to it as merely a death certificate, and so far as being ample additional pay for the services they had rendered their country, it was a rather feeble settlement on the part of the Government with the men who had defended its honor and sustained its prestige at home and abroad.

Of course, if the soldier lives for 13 years more, this certificate will be paid to him in full, if he has not lost it in the meantime by having to borrow money on it that he can never pay back. If he should pass away in the meantime, it would be paid his beneficiary.

DEBT TO SOLDIERS

But the real question now involved is whether the Government is willing to waive the time of paying these certificates due in 1945, and in view of the distressed condition of the ex-service men at this time mature them and pay them now.

My candid opinion is that, in view of what the Government is now doing for almost every interest and industry in the country to whom it owes no special favors, that it should mature these obligations that it owes the ex-service men and pay them in full now.

FOREIGN DEBTS SETTLEMENT

At the end of the World War foreign countries owed the United States in round numbers $22,000,000,000, which we had loaned to them to prosecute the war.

In the readjustment of these debts the United States has lost or remitted the huge sum of about $11,000,000,000—this is what we have done for foreign countries in the way of settlement and readjustment of the international war debts.

During the present Congress in addition to the above we have granted foreign countries a moratorium of one year on interest payments amounting to over $250,000,000, which in my opinion was inexcusable and indefensible.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The present Congress also set up a Government Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a capital stock of $500,000,000 to be subscribed by the Treasury of the United States, for the purpose of making loans to banks, railroads, insurance companies, and other financial and industrial institutions.

On the 6th of this month, President Hoover at his Rapidan summer home, gave out the statement with reference to the work of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in which he says the review of the work of the corporation showed that in the 14 weeks of its life loans of about $500,000,000 were authorized to something like 4,000 banks, agricultural credit corporations, life-insurance companies, and other financial institutions, and additional thereto about $170,000,000 to railroads.

It is a strange coincidence that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has taken care of 4,000 banks, which is just about the number of ex-service men now in Washington, waiting and hoping that Congress will do something for them.

I am not criticizing the President or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the hundreds of millions of dollars of Government credit that they have extended to the banks, railroads, insurance companies, building-and-loan associations in order to save them from bankruptcy and ruin, but I do insist that after having extended such a strong helping hand to these institutions to whom the Government owes no special obligation that it can well afford to extend the financial help to the soldiers to whom the Government has already executed its obligation to pay him in the year 1945 a fixed and definite amount as additional compensation for the services he has rendered our Government in time of war and pay him the full amount of his compensation certificate now.

The plan by which this payment is to be made under the present bill will cause the Treasury no financial embarrassment for the law provides that the Treasury issue currency in the amount of the balance due on the certificates, good for the payment of all debts, public and private, backed by an abundance of unassigned gold, to be used for payment to the men holding these Government obligations. This would serve a double purpose of paying the men and imperative expansion of currency which we must have if commodity prices are to be revived.

There is provision for the issuance of a like amount of bonds with the currency, same to be placed in the Federal reserve banks as custodians, so that if the value of the dollar ever falls below normal, the Federal Reserve Board can place these bonds on sale and thereby take out of circulation enough currency to stabilize the dollar at the normal level.

This currency will not be fiat money as contended by the enemies of this legislation, but upon the contrary will be just as sound as any currency now in circulation.

Furthermore, the passage of the bonus bill and the payment of the amount of the adjusted-compensation certificates now held by ex-service men will not only be doing justice to the soldier, who is just as much in financial distress as any of the great institutions that the Government is helping, but it will, in my opinion, have a most uplifting financial effect upon our entire country, because it will distribute over $2,000,000,000 of new money more equally among all the people than anything that can happen just at this time.

Of the amount paid to the soldiers, Texas will receive $95,000,000.

My congressional district will receive $6,924,346.84, distributed as follows:

Harris County	$5,900,165.76
Fort Bend County	487,969.56
Grimes County	371,781.64
Waller County	164,429.88
Total	6,924,346.84

Who will question for one moment that what the country needs now is more money in circulation, and this bill would put into almost immediate circulation the amounts as above stated; and who will question for a moment that this amount of money distributed as nearly equal as could be possible over the entire country among a people that would immediately put the same into every artery of trade and commerce, would not be a financial blessing?

The ex-service men would immediately begin the payment and liquidation of their debts, which would include merchants, doctors, banks, mortgage companies, home builders—in fact, every institution to whom he owes obligation, and it would do more, in my opinion, to relieve the economic depression and start us on the road to financial recovery than any one thing that we could do at the present moment.

Therefore, let us meet the full obligation that we now owe the men who offered to make the supreme sacrifice to defend and maintain the honor and glory of our country both at home and abroad, by paying him in full his bonus and start the wheels of prosperity going once again.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I favor this measure providing for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the soldiers of the World War, often called soldiers' bonus.

First. I do not believe there will ever be a time when the soldiers will need it worse or can use it to a better advantage.

Second. It will provide $2,400,000,000 additional circulating medium in the form of Treasury notes without levying and collecting any additional taxes.

The bill as amended provides for payment of the adjusted-service certificate by the issuance of Treasury notes. No opponent of this measure or any economist has claimed that this would not be just as good money as any now circulating.

It will not be denied that the dollar to-day is a high dollar. It is rated by economists as worth $2 as compared to the 1919 dollar, and about $1.60 as compared with the dollar in 1926. Leading business men think of it now as a $2 dollar. Before there can be substantial and permanent relief to our country the difference between the dollar and commodity value must be narrow. I believe the main opposition to this bill comes from that interest which would not have the value of the dollar affected.

The adjusted-service pay to the soldiers was not intended as a reward for patriotism. Congress admitted that there were due each of the soldiers $1 additional per day for home service and $1.25 for each day overseas service. The issuance of these certificates was intended by Congress to equalize the amount the soldier received with that of those who were not in the military service.

This adjusted compensation or bonus act was passed by Congress in 1924. After the war Congress adjusted the pay of the railroads to the amount of $1,600,000,000; also adjusted the pay of war contractors to the amount of $2,000,000,000. They were not asked to accept adjusted-service certificates, but were paid in cash. Congress canceled approximately $11,000,000,000 owed to us by foreign countries in the foreign-debt settlements.

I voted against each of these bills providing a reduction on debts due us by foreign countries. Early in this session of Congress I opposed and voted against the moratorium recommended by the President extending payment of debts due our Government by foreign countries for money loaned them during and after the World War. I am opposed to any modification or cancellation of these foreign debts. I believe that everyone will agree that the World War veterans should have been paid their adjusted-service certificates in cash, just as the railroads and war contractors were paid, who made enormous profits out of the war. The World War veterans hold a due bill of our Government.

Under the provision of this bill only certificates will be paid when applied for by the soldier. When we drafted these men into the service they were told that they would receive just treatment at the hands of our Government when the war ended. I have favored the payment of these certificates from the very beginning and even voted to pass a bill providing for the payment over the veto of the President. They should have been paid long ago, but that is no reason why they should not be paid at this time.

A table compiled by the Veterans' Administration shows that the amount that would be paid to the holders of adjusted-service certificates in the State of Alabama amounts to $29,876,139.92; and each of the counties in the eighth Alabama district, which I have the honor to represent, would be paid as follows:

Colbert County	$337,119.40
Jackson County	416,386.49
Lauderdale County	464,357.70
Lawrence County	304,175.16
Limestone County	413,541.41
Madison County	729,593.67
Morgan County	521,327.04

These amounts would go a long way toward relieving much distress. Many of the holders of these certificates are in dire need of money with which to purchase the necessities of life. This money would no doubt change hands a dozen times within 90 days. It is not difficult to understand the advantages that would accrue not only to the service men but to practically everyone in the community where the soldier resides.

It is said these certificates are not due. It is true that Congress made provision for their payment in 1945. This was very unfair and unjust to the soldiers and should be corrected. No one else has been required to await payment of a claim against the Government. This was merely an act of Congress which can be amended and repealed. Such things are happening every day in Congress. Since the time of payment was fixed for payment in 1945, Congress authorized the ex-service men to borrow as much as 50 per cent of the face value of their certificates, and are required to pay 4½ per cent interest, compounded annually. This rate of interest is very unfair and unjust to the ex-service man. The result will be that those who have borrowed on their certificates would only receive an average of about $18 in 1945.

It is estimated that there are 750,000 able-bodied ex-service men of the World War now unemployed who are in dire need of the amount due them by the Government to aid in the support of themselves and families during this awful depression.

This bill provides for the payment of these certificates, as I have said, without any additional taxation, simply by taking up the obligation of the Government which is in form of adjusted-service certificates and issue in lieu thereof Treasury notes. We issued and sold Liberty bonds and loaned money to our allies and foreign countries, some of which was used by them in paying their soldiers a bonus much larger than was provided for ours.

In 1917 and 1918 when some of the privileged class who are now opposing this legislation were engaged in the innocent pastime of making millions of dollars to add to their swollen treasury, these ex-service men were drafted and taken from their homes, their families, their business and shipped across the sea to fight. Many of them untrained in a cruel war to live in rain-soaked and vermin-infested trenches.

Mention has been made that the presence of several thousand veterans at the National Capital was tantamount to an act of coercion toward the Members of Congress. I have not heard of a single threat against any Member of Congress coming from an ex-service man who is here in Washington or elsewhere in the country. They have just as much right to lobby in behalf of this measure as the bankers and predatory interests did in behalf of legislation in which they are interested. Whether or not they were ill advised in coming here in such large numbers is not an issue. Their conduct during their stay so far has demonstrated that they are orderly, quiet, and well behaved. Many of them have told me they had rather have a job than cash on their adjusted-service certificates.

The enactment of this legislation would not be in conflict with our program of economy, as it calls for no additional taxation.

I have supported and voted for each measure providing for a reduction of salaries of Federal employees and Federal officials.

I trust that we will be able to enact legislation that will relieve all who are in distress and provide work for many who are now unemployed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I had asked for and had been promised time to speak on the pending Patman bill providing for the full cash payment of the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates. However, by reason of the tragic and untimely death of our beloved colleague, Representative E. E. Eslick, while pleading for the passage of this bill, it was agreed that there should be no further general debate on the bill. Consequently I am availing myself of the privilege accorded all Members to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

I am unqualifiedly in favor of paying the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates in cash and in full. I have always been in favor of cash payment to the soldiers of adjusted-service compensation.

This is not a bonus. It was a just obligation of the Government even before the issuance of the adjusted-service certificates. When our boys were sent into military service, the pay of a private soldier, as fixed by the law many years previously, when the cost of living was much less, was $30 per month for domestic service and $33 for overseas service. It was generally recognized that this was inadequate compensation under conditions and prices then obtaining, and especially for men to undergo the risks and hardships of real warfare. Besides a large portion of the meager wages of most of the soldiers was consumed in the payment for war-risk insurance and subscriptions for Liberty bonds and war-savings stamps; and many of the soldiers made allotments to dependents of a portion of their pay. While they were in military service, a large percentage of those remaining at home received greatly increased wages and income.

During the war there was considerable discussion in Congress in favor of increasing the soldiers' wages; but there being a difference of opinion as to the amount of wages which should be fixed and also many pressing war measures pending, the matter was passed over for later adjustment.

After the conclusion of the war there began a discussion and consideration of fixing and paying the soldiers' adjusted compensation—a reasonable amount in addition to the wages received by them, so as to pay them fair and just wages for their services. The American Legion recommended a five fold plan, including an option for payment in cash. We passed such a bill through the House of Representatives in 1920, the adjusted pay being on the basis of $1 per day for service in this country and $1.25 per day for overseas service, excluding the first 60 days of service, presumably because the soldiers had been paid $60 upon discharge. However, that bill died in the Senate.

In the next Congress, the Sixty-seventh, the friends of the ex-service men again sought to enact legislation providing for the payment of adjusted compensation to the soldiers. The Committee on Ways and Means held hearings on the same kind of a bill which had previously passed the House and as recommended by the American Legion. However, the committee reported to the House a bill providing for the issuance of adjusted-service certificates payable in 20 years or upon the death of the holder of the certificate.

The bill was brought up under a rule which precluded the right of amendment. I then insisted that it was a just obligation which the Government should pay in cash, as it paid its other obligations, and not compel the soldiers to wait 20 years for payment, and that at least 90 per cent of the soldiers desired to be paid in cash; that the proposed plan was not the one recommended by the American Legion or the one desired by the ex-service men. Hereinafter will be found a portion of my remarks on the bill at the time. Billions of dollars were paid to war contractors and for various other losses growing out of the war, and paid in cash. Much of this involved neither a legal nor a moral obligation on the part of the Government but was called "equitable claims." Everybody was paid in cash except the boys who had gone to war and risked their all for our country. This is a just obligation, and the Government should have long since paid it. Least of all should the soldiers have been required to wait for their adjusted pay. However, no opportunity to amend being permitted, a bill providing merely for the issuance of adjusted-service certificates, payable 20 years from date of issuance, was passed and vetoed by President Harding.

In the following Congress the Committee on Ways and Means again ignored the recommendation of the American Legion and the wishes of the soldiers and their real friends in the House and reported another bill providing for the issuance of adjusted-service certificates, to be dated seven and one-half years after the war, and payable 20 years thereafter except in the case of death. No opportunity was given for amendment, and so the bill passed in that form and became a law. During the pendency of this bill I again vigorously insisted that the veterans should be paid in cash, or at least given the option to receive their pay in cash. Naturally, the ex-service men have never been satisfied with those certificates instead of being paid in cash. There has ever since been a pronounced sentiment in favor of cash payment to the ex-service men. This natural insistence became more pronounced during the present panic by reason of the fact that so many of the veterans were out of employment or working on part time.

We made a fight in the last Congress for the full cash payment of these adjusted-service certificates, resulting in a compromise bill, providing that the holders of the adjusted-service certificates should be permitted to borrow up to 50 per cent of their face value, provided the certificates had been issued at least two years previously. As those in power forced these certificates upon the veterans, they should have certainly been dated back to the time the services were rendered.

During the past 12 years I have repeatedly declared in favor of the cash payment of the amount due the World War veterans as adjusted compensation for their services rendered during the war. During the last summer and fall I so expressed myself in several speeches in my district. For instance, in an Armistice Day address I delivered at Winchester, under the auspices of the American Legion, I discussed the matter fully, insisted that it was a just obligation of the Government which should be paid in cash and in full, and stated that we friends of the veterans would renew the fight in the ensuing Congress. From the beginning of the present session I have so expressed myself repeatedly in letters to various veterans' posts and to numerous others.

When the present Congress convened it was generally agreed among the friends of the ex-service men in the House that Congressman PATMAN's bill should have right of way. Finally the Ways and Means Committee held hearings thereon. Before this committee acted, but when it was indicated that they were hostile to the bill, a poll was taken to ascertain whether sufficient signatures of Members could be obtained to discharge the committee and bring the bill to the House for a vote, and I then announced that I would sign the petition.

I did sign the petition as soon as I learned it was on the Speaker's desk and before formal notice was sent to Members that the petition was on the Speaker's desk for signatures.

If there had ever been any doubt as to an obligation on the part of the Government to pay the World War veterans' adjusted compensation, that was finally and definitely settled when, pursuant to congressional act, the obligation was recognized and the Government issued to the veterans obligations in the form of adjusted-service certificates. These are just as binding as any other obligation of the Government.

Those who are opposing the cash payment of these obligations to the soldiers were chiefly the ones who revised the obligations to the United States from various European nations and canceled a large part of those obligations; those most bitterly opposing this just measure are the ones who were chiefly instrumental in granting the $252,000,000 moratorium to foreign nations during the present session.

I voted against those debt cancellations and this moratorium not only because I thought it was unfair to the American taxpayers but also because I thought that we should be just to our own citizens before we should be generous to aliens. This Government should certainly be just, first of all to those who were taken away from their homes and required to risk their lives and health in camp and in actual warfare in defense of our country and its honor before being so generous to foreign nations and also the big business interests.

There could never be a time when these veterans will need this money due to them from their Government any more than they do now.

I am not only for the full cash payment of these adjusted-service certificates now because it is a just obligation which should be paid, but I am also for the pending bill because in my opinion it would prove to be the most effective general-relief measure which has yet been proposed. As strongly as we are convinced that these adjusted-service certificates should be paid now in cash, and in full, yet the author and the advocates of this bill have made it clear that we would not ask for the payment of these adjusted-service certificates at this time, if it involved any additional burdens upon the taxpayers.

This bill calls for no taxes and imposes no burdens upon the public. In fact, we are convinced that it will not only prove of great benefit to the veterans in a time of dire distress but will prove of very great benefit to the country as a whole. As has been fully explained, it is provided that these soldier obligations shall be paid by the issuance of new currency in a manner which is declared to be perfectly sound by some of the highest authorities on economics in this country.

It is generally conceded that one of the causes of our present economic distress is due to the fact that our currency is unusually contracted and much of the outstanding currency is being hoarded. The dollar is too high and commodities are correspondingly too low. We can have no economic recovery until the dollar is stabilized on a proper basis when measured in commodities. The purpose of this bill is to bring the dollar and commodity prices to the basis obtaining in 1926. The dollar is now worth about $1.60 compared to what it was then.

The dollar is much higher than that when measured in farm products. Cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, cattle, and most other farm products bring only about one-fifth of what they did a few years ago. Most of the present debts were contracted when farm products were bringing several times what they do now. It is an unfair and an unjust situation, and it is our duty to reduce the purchasing power of the dollar to a normal basis. That can be done by the expansion of our currency and a proper distribution of the currency. No method could possibly be devised which would bring about a wider and more equitable distribution of the currency than to pay it to the World War veterans. It would go into every nook and corner in the land and would be put to immediate use.

This bill simply proposes to convert non negotiable Government obligations into negotiable obligations and puts them into immediate circulation throughout the land; it not only imposes no new obligations upon the taxpayers but will actually save $112,000,000 a year from now until 1945, which is required to create a sinking fund to liquidate the outstanding adjusted-service certificates.

If this bill providing for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates becomes a law, the World War veterans in Tennessee will be paid in cash $36,108,472.80. The World War veterans of the new fourth congressional district of Tennessee will be paid $3,880,532.40, distributed among the different counties as follows: Bedford, $290,862.60; Cannon, $123,303; Clay, $132,162.60; Coffee, $231,853.80; DeKalb, $196,139.40; Fentress, $152,296.80; Franklin, $300,784.80; Jackson, $187,528.20; Lincoln, $350,823.60; Marshall, $214,921.20; Moore, $55,710.60; Overton, $249,490.20; Pickett, $77,487; Putnam, $327,874.20; Rutherford, $445,546.80; Smith, $213,527.40; Wilson, $330,220.20.

We hear the same old charge that if the boys are paid in cash, they will waste their money. I deny that. General Hines, Director of Veterans' Administration, kept records and gave out statistics showing that an overwhelming percentage of the loans made to veterans last spring was used for necessities, and a very small percentage was wasted. Besides, that is none of our business. The money is due them, they are all grown men, and have a right to spend their money as they please.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 20, 1932, on page 13515, contains the following statement in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE]:

> This Government is taking care of its soldiers ten times better to-day than any other Government to-day or in all the history of the world. [Applause.]

An analysis of this statement will reveal that all the facts probably were not taken into consideration and very likely the statement was made in the heat of debate, without attempting to be absolutely accurate. Similar statements are being made by newspapers and magazines. The United States is spending less for her veterans than any of our allies during the war or Germany.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

Four million five hundred thousand men were mobilized by the United States during the war. During and since the World War the Government has expended about $5,500,000,000 on these veterans and their dependents, widows and orphans; this amount includes more than a billion dollars of insurance benefits that the men paid for themselves with their own money and should not be charged up against them, but it is. This expenditure has been for the benefit of about 500,000 crippled and disabled veterans and to dependents of those who were killed during the war or died of service-connected disabilities during or since the war. Very little of this money has fallen into unworthy hands. There have been abuses; they should be eliminated and are being eliminated. Four million of the men mobolized have never, since the war, received a penny from the Government, except their adjusted-service certificates and the benefits accruing to them therefrom.

TWO OUT OF EIGHTEEN

An illustration of benefits may be given in this way: Separate 18 average veterans from the others, or divide them into groups of 18. Of that number, 1 of the 18 has a service-connected disability and is drawing the average compensation of $44 a month. Another of the 18 was not able to prove that his disability was service connected or has a disability not connected with his service and is drawing the average disability allowance of $18 a month for a disability of 50 per cent to 74 per cent. The other 16 veterans have never drawn a penny in the form of compensation or disability allowance. Yet many people would have the country believe that all veterans of the World War have been receiving compensation in some form from the Government.

GENEROSITY COMPARED WITH OTHER NATIONS

In determining benefits to veterans the ability of the Nation to pay should be taken into consideration. According to national wealth and national income, our Government spends much less for its veterans of the World War than any other nation.

The United States expends for her World War veterans annually the sum of $1 for every $800 of national wealth and owes 4 per cent of her national wealth; France, $1 for every $170 of national wealth, and she owes 20 per cent of her national wealth; England, $1 for every $700 of national wealth and owes 40 per cent of her national wealth; and the conquered country, Germany, even expends for her World War veterans the sum of $1 for every $130 of national wealth.

The United States expends for her World War veterans annually the sum of $1 for every $125 of national income; France, $1 for every $26 of national income; England, $1 for every $110 of national income; and Germany, $1 for every $40 of national income.

In addition to these benefits and other expenditures for veterans, France has furnished her veterans employment since the war. When they are not employed they are paid unemployment insurance and doles. All people in France over 65 years of age and the poor, infirm, and incurables are provided for. They are provided with insurance against normal risks and loss of time by reason of illness, maternity, disablement, old age, and death.

England, in addition to benefits named for veterans of the World War, also expends for her World War veterans and other citizens hundreds of millions of dollars annually for unemployment relief (last year this bill was $265,000,000), poor relief, housing the working class, widows, orphans, old-age pensions for all over 65, free medical relief, and doles. The bill for all these benefits aggregates almost a billion dollars a year. Veterans of the World War and other citizens of Great Britain who are at the present time residing in this country and are unemployed are being paid what is equal to $7 and $8 a week, in our money, each week in the form of unemployment relief.

Germany, the conquered country, that is borrowing so much money from our international bankers on the credit of the United States, is not only spending several times as much for her veterans as we are spending, but she also gives her veterans and other citizens doles and unemployment insurance. Over 4,000,000 citizens of Germany, many of them veterans, are receiving $500,000,000 annually; no part of it is charged up as veteran relief.

No person, veteran or nonveteran, is permitted to go hungry and without sufficient clothing in England, France, and other countries that received from our Government a gift of more than $10,000,000,000 a few years ago; these countries also paid their veterans bonuses and adjusted compensation for war services, in some instances as high as $7,290 each.

WHAT VETERANS WILL STAND FOR

I am sure the veterans of the World War will continue to maintain the same unselfish and patriotic attitude that they have maintained in the past; that they will advocate and cause the enactment of laws for the benefit of the poor, aged, unemployed, sick, infirm, widows, and orphans, and continue to fight for measures in the National Congress that will promote the general welfare. The veterans of the World War are not asking for service pensions.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM NEBRASKA, MR. SIMMONS

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] made a speech in the House June 14, 1932, in which he attempted to show that the United States is paying her veterans more than the conquered country—Germany—or any of our allies during the war, and indicated we should reduce expenditures for our veterans. His statement that the United States is expending $860,635,000 this year for the relief of World War veterans and their dependents is evidently a mistake. He is doubtless charging up to the veterans the insurance benefits that they themselves paid for and certain benefits extended to veterans of other wars.

THE GENTLEMEN FROM MICHIGAN, MR. CLANCY

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] made a speech June 14, 1932, in opposition to the bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates. In this speech I am severely criticized and the gentleman from Michigan informs the House of his many alleged activities in connection with the full payment bill. The gentleman's statement discloses that he does not know what the bill H. R. 7726 with the Owen amendment provides. He advocates a bond issue, when he knows we would have no chance to get such a proposal through Congress. The bill voted upon in the House was identical with H. R. 1 except the financing part. No informed person refers to the money that is to be distributed in payment of the remainder due on the certificates as "fiat money." It is no more fiat money than any other money. In my speech of June 15, 1932, this proposition is thoroughly explained. The gentleman was misinformed as to what I said before the Rules Committee; the typewritten copy of the testimony was available, and I am sorry that he did not inform himself before making the statement.

The gentleman has done so little, if anything, to accomplish what he claims he has stood for; and he knows so little about the merits of the proposal, I do not care to spend more time commenting upon his remarks. He never signed the petition to force consideration of the bill; that was the only way consideration could be obtained. Last year when his help was very much needed on the bill, which resulted in the passage of the 50 per cent loan law, he was on a junketing trip to Panama.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES DURING THE WAR

The 500,000 Federal employees, with annual salaries of $2,500 or less, received an average of $1,000 adjusted or additional pay for their war services; they were paid cash at the time the services were rendered. That is all the veterans are asking for, the payment in cash of the $1 and $1.25 a day that has already been acknowledged as of the time the services were rendered.

RAILROADS

The railroad owners were paid between one and two billion dollars extra pay for their war services—paid in cash at the time the services were rendered and shortly thereafter. Why compel the veterans to wait 26½ years after the war for their adjusted compensation?

WAR CONTRACTORS

About $3,000,000,000 were paid to war contractors shortly after the war. The fifth Victory loan drive provided the funds for this purpose and the payment to the railroads. The war contractors, in order to get this additional amount, were given a special act of Congress, which was passed in 80 minutes' time, validating and legalizing contracts that were void and in violation of the law.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES

After the war, foreign countries, our allies, had their debts adjusted and were given the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000 by the United States Congress; they used this money to pay their own soldiers and are now using it to provide for the hungry and destitute people in their countries while our own people are required to suffer.

MELLONS

The World's Work for March and April, 1932, has a very interesting article about "My Brother and I," referring to Andrew W. Mellon and his brother. It discloses that this pair now own and control wealth of our Nation aggregating $7,995,000,000. I venture the assertion that at least $7,000,000,000 of this wealth was brought into their ownership and control by the World War and by reason of the country's misery and misfortune. If the President had not pardoned Mr. Mellon in the middle of a trial before the Judiciary Committee of the House some very interesting disclosures would have been made about the accumulation of this wealth.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

They must be paid. The debt has already been confessed and acknowledged. We are merely asking that it be paid as of the time the services were rendered instead of 1945; that is asking that the same principle of government be invoked for the veterans that was invoked for the war profiteers. It is true a revision of one part of the contract is being asked—the adjusted compensation act of 1924—but only for the purpose of carrying out another part of that same act which said the veterans were entitled to $1 a day for home service and $1.25 a day for service overseas. We want the payment made as of 1917, 1918, and 1919, instead of 1925. A dollar paid in 1925 was equal to a payment of 60 cents or 70 cents in 1918. Foreign countries asked Congress to revise their contracts. The request was quickly granted and the gift of $10,000,000,000 extended. If the payment is made now, the country will be helped; it can be made without a bond issue, or increase of taxes. If paid now, it will require about $2,200,000,000. If not paid now, the Government and the banks will consume practically all the remainder due in compound interest charged on prior loans.

HOW MUCH IS $2,000,000,000?

The railroad owners received two billions for war services in addition to regular pay. The war contractors received three billions in addition to regular and legal payments. Foreign countries received five times as much as two billions. The Mellons obtained possession of at least three times $2,000,000,000 by reason of the war.

The question is fully discussed in this volume. I hope every member of the House will read Senator Owen's testimony before the committee in support of this legislation.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, let us by all means enact this bill and finally dispose of the debt we have owed the World War veterans since they served us in 1917 and 1918. We acknowledged this debt by the act of 1924. We admitted it to be a just debt. The whole purpose of providing these adjusted-service certificates was simply to compensate the soldiers more adequately for their services, by bringing their pay somewhere near that which workers who served in industries at home during the war received. It is, of course, absurd to claim that even with the adjusted compensation the payment for the services rendered by the soldiers is adequate. But be that as it may, the Congress recognized the debt, and provided that there should be an additional payment of $1 per day for home service and an additional $1.25 a day for overseas service.

The veterans preferred, and I, along with many other Members, favored the cash payment of the adjusted compensation in 1924 when the bill was before the House. However, the Congress decided instead to give the veterans a certificate equivalent to the amount of insurance that money would buy on a 20-year endowment plan. All certificates applied for before 1925 were dated January 1, 1925, and those applied for subsequently were given the date of application and were made payable 20 years after date. These certificates range in value from $126 to $1,590 each, the average being $1,000.

If interest at the rate of 6 per cent compounded semiannually were paid on this sum from the war period to date, it would be found to be equal to the face value of the policy due in 1945. Therefore this debt is due now, unless we wish to apply to those who served us in the World War a principle different from the one that we applied to the munition manufacturers, who were paid in cash, and who have drawn interest on what they have received ever since. The veteran earned this money the same time that the munition manufacturer earned his. He should have gotten it at the same time.

Much of the opposition to this measure has been artificially stimulated and rests on grounds that have no justification in fact.

I am in favor of paying the bonus not only because it is a just debt, and we pride ourselves on paying our debts, not only because it will help the veterans, most of whom are in distress, but because it will help the Nation and every group of the population in the first serious attempt that is being made to restore some measure of economic recovery.

The Congress is getting ready to adjourn, and the only measures that have been enacted so far, in the face of the worst panic that this country has ever been in, have been measures that proceeded on the theory that if you help the people on top some of the help will percolate down to the bottom rungs of the social ladder.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, you will recall, was going to restore prosperity by making available $2,000,000,000, which would be put into circulation. If it has been in circulation, my constituents have not been able to find any of it, and that is true of the constituents of most of us. I suspected at the time the law was enacted that it would not achieve the purposes which its sponsors claimed. Events have confirmed my predictions.

The revision of the banking laws that would enable the smaller banks to pool their resources and obtain assistance from the Federal reserve bank has not been any more effective in bringing about the one thing which everyone concedes is essential before there can be any advance toward economic recovery—the circulation of money, not on top, where they now have more than they know what to do with, but at the bottom, where money is scarcer than it has ever been since the beginning of the depression.

I am convinced that the crux of our difficulty to-day is to be found in the shortage of money. Drives have been made against hoarding, but the 10,000,000 men who are reported to be out of work are not hoarding. The thousands of farmers who find that their homes are being sold for nonpayment of taxes and interest are not hoarding. The business men, driven to the wall by the inability of the workers and farmers to purchase the necessities of life, are not hoarding.

It is admitted by economists and all students of the problem that if money can be put into circulation—again I say, at the bottom, where the people need it, not at the top—there will be some immediate relief. The proposals for the undertaking of public works on a large scale are in line with that idea.

So is the adjusted-service measure which we are now considering. The enactment of this bill will place in circulation $2,400,000,000 of additional money. It will make money more plentiful, and as money comes down commodity prices will go up. The soldiers will begin buying. The buying power will be reinvested in our farm population, since the farmers will have money with which to buy.

The same economic law that governs the price of wheat, corn, cotton, oil, and everything else that the farmer raises or the manufacturer makes, also governs the price of money. When money is plentiful, money is cheap; when money is scarce, money is dear. Paying the cash bonus will, as I have said, make money more plentiful and, therefore, cheaper.

Every dollar that the soldier receives through this bill will help make purchases and pay debts immediately. Thousands of homes will be saved from foreclosure, and as many farms will be saved to the present owners. So desperate has the situation become that Gov. Philip La Follette, of Wisconsin, has recently declared a moratorium on sales of tax-delinquent property. Instead of putting these properties up for sale June 15 the owners will have until October 15 to meet their tax assessments. But unless something is done, and done soon, the problem will have only been postponed, not solved.

There are 3,660,000 World War veterans in the country, distributed throughout the land. Giving them the money will give it the widest possible circulation. It will reach into every village and into every hamlet. There is no other program that I know of—not even the public-works program—that would affect as wide a distribution. In addition to this, I hope that Congress will not adjourn until legislation providing for a nation-wide public-works program is enacted to give work to the unemployed.

All we have to do to accomplish this is to pay a debt which sooner or later must be paid anyway, and which, if paid immediately, will benefit millions of people who are on the very precipice.

What is more, if we pay it now under the method that has been proposed, we will save the Government $112,000,000 a year. To that extent it helps balance the Budget.

The argument that many regard as the most plausible in opposition to this bill is that the payment of the cash now will unbalance the Budget. But those who advance that argument either deliberately or unwittingly overlook the method by which the payment is to be made.

Under the Owen amendment, which this bill carries, sufficient currency to make the payment in the form of Treasury certificates would be issued. We would by that action inflate the currency. That is necessary if we are to get down to earth. But we would not be issuing fiat money, as some contend, and which I would certainly oppose.

There is approximately $5,600,000,000 in currency in the United States to-day. The payment provided by this bill would bring the total up to about $8,000,000,000. Under the Owen plan the Treasury Department would issue $2,400,000,000 in Government bonds, bearing interest at 3½ per cent, payable in 20 years, with an option to pay after 10 years. These bonds are to be placed in all the Federal reserve banks with directions to the Federal Reserve Board to sell these bonds only when deflation becomes necessary—that is, when the buying power of the dollar goes downward and reaches the point at which it was in 1926. When that point is reached sufficient bonds will be released and currency accordingly taken up to hold the value of the money at a fairly stabilized position. If this occurred, the panic would be over. And if the experiment helped bring us back to normal conditions, it would be worth many times more than the amount paid to the veterans.

The currency so issued is not fiat money. It is controlled currency and is fully protected as to parity under the gold standards act.

Prof. Irving Fisher, one of the Nation's foremost economists, testified before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and in reply to inquiries as to the soundness of the Owen plan, said that this was a perfectly sound method. I shall not go into his testimony in detail, but it supports the view advanced by the most reliable authorities on the subject that we can achieve the thing most urgently needed—a general and widespread circulation of money—to benefit the Nation, on terms that will save the Government money and will supply to all groups of the population much-needed funds.

Every State and every group within every State should benefit. In my own State of Wisconsin it will place into circulation $52,431,867.04, and of that amount $5,365,094.56 will be paid to veterans living in the eighth congressional district.

The following table, compiled from information furnished by the Veterans' Administration, shows the amounts which will be paid to veterans residing in each of the counties of the eighth congressional district:

Brown	$1,253,242.16
Door	324,366.88
Florence	67,221.12
Forest	198,345.12
Kewaunee	286,100.08
Manitowoc	1,046,744.16
Marinette	598,175.20
Oconto	470,726.24
Outagamie	1,120,173.60
Total	5,365,094.56

Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have assigned, I shall vote for the pending bill. I consider it a constructive measure of general, nation-wide significance that will halt the forces of disintegration and demoralization. This Congress has tried many other methods since we first met last December. They have failed, in my judgment, because they started at the wrong end of the social ladder. This bill starts at the other end, the one that has been neglected. We have assisted by acts of Congress the creditors of the Nation, the bankers, the insurance companies, the railroads, and so forth. Let us pass this bill and help our debtors.

I am not among those Members who have been horrified by the presence of a large number of the assembled unemployed veterans. They have not intimidated me. They have encouraged me to believe that there is enough manhood and fight left in Americans to prevent a catastrophe. I would much rather see these men gather here from the four corners of the Nation to demand a square deal than to have them humbly and submissively die of starvation. They are part of the army of unemployed. They are victims of the crisis; otherwise they would not be here. The greatest danger that we faced was that Americans would go under without having the courage and fortitude to demand that they should not starve in the midst of plenty.

After all, these men are lobbyists. Not the kind of lobbyists to which we are accustomed. They do not come to town on well-furnished Pullman trains seated in reclining chairs. Their Pullmans are the side-door Pullmans or the rods above the rails. They do not stop at expensive hotels. They do not work quietly at secret committee meetings or in social gatherings to achieve their aims. Many of them lie down in the mud at night; all of them are exposed to severe hardships; but when they request a hearing they are out in the open, their colors displayed, their motives fully known. They have come in large numbers, because they must make up in numbers what, as poverty-stricken veterans, they lack in influence. If they were to come more often, some of the things that have brought about the condition our country is now in might have been avoided. For one thing, this might be made the kind of country they were told it would be when they went across the sea "to make the world a better place to live in."

For their sake, for the sake of millions of our fellow citizens, for the Nation's sake, let us enact this bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, under the permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to state my reasons for opposing the Patman bill, which was up for consideration before the House and which passed the House by a small majority and which was defeated in the Senate by a very large and decided majority.

Practically everyone in both Houses of Congress has known for some time past that this bill would never become a law. The President of the United States, several months ago announced his determination, on account of the financial condition of the Government, to veto any proposed bonus legislation. And after the announcement of the President, through the public press, I doubt if there were any Members of Congress who did not realize in the first place that there were not sufficient votes in the House to pass the bill over the President's veto, and that if it should pass the House, which it did, that it would be defeated in the Senate, which it was. In addition to this, the Ways and Means Committee of the House by a majority report, reported adversely on all bonus legislation and the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives refused to give a ruling upon this adverse report. Two of the greatest committees in the House refused to consider this legislation, and when the bill finally went to the Senate, the Finance Committee of the Senate by a vote of 12 to 2 also reported adversely upon the consideration of the so-called Patman bonus legislation.

Before stating the reasons for the opposition to this bill, it is not amiss to say that practically every Member of the House and Senate would like to see the bonus paid, but the opposition to this bill was that it was unsound and that it would seriously affect the financial welfare of each veteran as well as the finances of the country. It was nothing more nor less than the issuance of paper money, commonly called fiat money, without anything to back it up. I do not believe that there is a veteran who would contend that either he or the Government could be benefited by the issuance of paper money without any reserve to back it up, of $8,000,000 a day for 300 working days in a year, or of $1,000,000 each and every hour in the day, or $16,666 each and every minute in the hour. So it amounted to nothing more or less than turning the printing press loose to print money at the rate of $16,666 per minute.

There are some who contend that an inflation or expansion of the currency without any reserve to back the currency is all that is necessary to restore prosperity. If this were so, then the entire administration and the entire Congress, instead of raising taxes to balance the Budget to pay the running expenses of the Government, should have just issued this kind of paper money; for the $3,000,000,000 deficit that we ran short for this past year in the operating expenses of the Government, which the Government owes and is an obligation.

All that is necessary would be to issue this fiat money to pay this obligation or debt, and you could carry it on in the same way that the Government could pay off all its indebtedness of $19,000,000,000 with this printing-press worthless money. In fact, it would be useless to have any taxes at all, because if this were so, all you would have to do would be to turn the printing press loose and print enough money on which to run the Government. You would not need any gold or silver reserve, according to this argument. I do not think that there are many service men or others interested in the adjusted compensation who believe that printing paper money would be beneficial to the veteran or to the Government.

A short time before the bonus bill came up for consideration in the House I introduced a bill to take care of the adjusted compensation. While it had its defects, it was far less objectionable from an economic standpoint than the bill which the House considered and which was defeated in the Senate. Quite a few veterans, as well as Government officials, expressed the opinion to me that this bill that I introduced was far more sound than the one which was considered. After quite a large amount of work I saw that I could not receive sufficient votes in the House to amend the bill that was being considered by substituting my bill. At some future date, when the Government is in a better financial position, I hope to press my bill for final passage.

I also introduced a bill at the first of the session to relieve the adjusted-service certificates from the interest on the loans which have been made.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, due to the unfortunate death of our colleague [Mr. Eslick] on the floor of the House during the debate on the bonus bill, further debate and discussion was terminated; therefore I have taken the privilege of expressing my views on this all-important question after the passage of the bill rather than before it, as I hoped.

Mr. Speaker, for two long and almost unbearable years the Republican Party, under the leadership of ex-President Roosevelt and aided and financed by the international bankers, our large industrialists, and the militaristic groups, conducted the most determined propaganda to force our Nation into the most devastating war in the history of the world. Realizing the horrors of war, I seriously hesitated before I cast my vote for the declaration of war; and after it had been declared, I urged and advocated enlistment to avoid general conscription. But since it was imperative to have as large an Army as possible in the field as quickly as possible, there was no alternative except to vote for general conscription. The Nation called them in her hour of need and they responded nobly. But then and there I firmly resolved and made a solemn vow that the men who had enlisted and those who had ben conscripted and offered their lives to their country would not go unrewarded, that I would do my part to see that they received fair treatment.

And in accordance with my promise, I advocated and voted for the war-risk insurance, rehabilitation, and compensation acts, believing that these men who sacrificed their position and good jobs were entitled to many times the dollar a day that they received. No one will deny that, I know, because those who remained behind were earning five to ten times as much.

Employment, position, opportunity were all laid aside in their desire to serve the country. Heroes they were then. But when they returned from France and the camps a rude shock awaited them, for they soon discovered that the heroes of 1917 and 1918 were "nobodies" of 1919 and that the jobs and positions that they left in a blaze of glory were filled by those who had stayed behind. Unfortunately, too, the patriotism shown by our leaders of industry during the war turned to greed soon after. And while it was my firm belief that the boys who served their country were entitled to the restoration of their jobs on their return, and while I made every effort to see that this was done, yet little or no response was paid to my appeals. The disillusionment that overtook many of the heroes was not pleasant to see, and it soon gave way to disgust. Some entered new fields of endeavor; some were successful; but the great mass of these men, maimed in mind and body, never fully recovered their pre-war status in industry.

Therefore when I realized that they were being discriminated against, that their service was not appreciated, that their health was undermined, and that their pleas were ignored, I joined in with a group of Members to enact legislation that would partially compensate them for the financial losses they sustained. We prepared the so-called bonus, which is, however, nothing more than a partial payment of the sum they could have earned, based on the lowest wage then paid to the American common laborer if there had been no war and they had stayed at home; 1945 was set as the date of payment because it was thought that it would be to the best interests of the majority of veterans if paid at that time.

But when unemployment continued and the needs and wants of the veterans increased I felt it was absolutely essential to discharge this debt without delay, for under no conditions was it anything else, and I advocated legislation to make it possible for them to secure loans up to 50 per cent of the adjustment certificates—that is, the pay that rightfully belonged to them. However, the general conditions, instead of growing better, have grown intolerably worse, and instead of there being only 25 per cent of these men out of employment, there are more than 50 per cent unemployed and in dire need of immediate relief.

But, gentlemen, a need for the payment has arisen which is far greater than any we had contemplated—a need which will affect not only the lives of these deserving ex-service men but the well-being of our entire Nation.

Our Nation is now in the throes of the most terrible economic and social cataclysm in its history. The agencies which we have created to cope with it apparently believe that the country's salvation depends upon aid to industry, the producer, and they have overlooked the people, the consumer. They have aided banks, railroads, and injudiciously the farmers, but there has been no diminution in the number of business failures, lowered business and commodity values, and the increasing unemployment and starvation. They have entirely overlooked the fact that the limited purchasing power of the consumer is the cause of the present plight of industry; and it appears to me that the agencies we created to restore normalcy are repairing the top of our financial structure without paying any attention to the foundation, which is tottering.

It is for the reason that the immediate payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates will increase the purchasing power of business and put money into circulation where it is most needed, and that this payment will have a tendency to restore confidence and make for the immediate revival of business that I have voted for this bill. We will not increase our indebtedness by providing for the immediate payment now; in fact, we will cancel it by the adoption of the so-called Owen plan, save approximately $120,000,000 in interest charges to the Government, and above all put $1,500,000,000 into circulation.

I have given this matter much study and I am satisfied that these 2,000,000 ex-service men who are needy and out of work will place this much money into circulation, for it will enable them to pay their obligations to their grocers, butchers, landlords, and, in many cases, taxes, which will prevent the loss of their homes. I am of the opinion that this will aid business and create a demand for labor.

Within the last few weeks I have received many telegrams and letters demanding that I vote against the bonus bill. Careful investigation has shown me that these telegrams and letters are in nearly all cases the result of a well-organized propaganda by the big bankers and financiers of this Nation—the very men who were foremost in advocating and demanding war, who were the beneficiaries of war's slimy profits, and who are responsible for the existing conditions. I do not feel, nor is it necessary for me to do so, that I should enlarge on the statement made by Mr. Brisbane in regard to the advisability of the immediate payment of the adjustment certificates:

The House to-day voted immediate cash payment of the $2,400,000,000 bonus certificates. Veterans would have preferred jobs, although spending two and a half billion dollars cash among the merchants, big and little, would be a wonderful thing for business revival.

Unfortunately, it is necessary to warn veterans that the bonus so quickly passed in the lower House will hardly become a reality.

There are those who believed that paying the bonus with money printed by this Government would in some way offend our national fetish, gold. We sent tens of billions to Europe without destroying the gold standard. But when it comes to paying men that we also sent to Europe, that is different.

For these reasons I have signed the petition to bring the bill before the House and subsequently have voted for it. I am satisfied that if it is enacted into law, it will reduce rather than increase taxes, will eliminate discontent, will instill confidence into the consumer, and hasten the return of prosperity, and will be a general blessing to all, even to those who are now strenuously opposing the measure.

Some claim that the authorization of the payment of the compensation at this time and in this manner will result in the inflation of our currency. There is, I believe, no justification for that claim. Not only have we enough gold as a reserve to warrant the issuance of additional Treasury notes, but this money will be just as good a currency as that issued by the Government or the banks against bonds, which in the last analysis have nothing but the assets of the country behind them. Therefore, instead of issuing bonds and paying the interest on them, why is it not possible and expedient to issue the currency directly? Of course, the banks dislike this because it would deprive them and the individuals who are hoarding the dollars whose purchasing power is high, and though it will not injure them, I feel that it will be of tremendous aid not only to the ex-service men and their families but indirectly to the entire Nation.

It has been claimed that the passage of this bill will hinder rather than aid the return of prosperity. The opponents of the measure claim that it will result in the inflation of our currency similar to that in Germany directly after the war. Several Members have stated that no country has ever solved its financial troubles "by way of the printing press." That phrase has been coined by the publicists and lobbyists of the very men and the very investment banking group that has kept the printing presses working day and night printing worthless stocks and bonds which these individuals have unloaded on the American people at exorbitant prices, and they are the men who are opposing the payment of certificates under this plan.

It is my contention, however, that conditions in this country are not at all similar to those in Germany after the war. We have a very peculiar condition before us. The law states that the gold reserve at any time must be at least 40 per cent of the notes in circulation. In comparison to other countries, this figure is very high. However, the important thing that I wish to bring out is the fact that our bullion reserve is not 40 per cent but about 60 per cent of the total amount of currency in circulation. Gentlemen know that this was not the condition in Germany after the war.

I am of the firm opinion that issuing the Treasury notes to pay up the ex-service men, going on with needed construction, and loaning amounts to the States and municipalities to enable them to pay their teachers and other employees, and provide work for their unemployed are the only things that will help the country out of the morass of stagnation and despair.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, because of the curtailment of general debate on the bonus bill, which was caused by the death of our distinguished colleague from Tennessee, which made it impossible to obtain time to speak before this bill was passed, I am availing myself of the privilege granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

At the outset may I state that if the benefits provided in this bill were to accrue only to those who served in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps during the World War, this measure might be objectionable class legislation. However, I believe that if enacted into law this proposed immediate cash payment of the bonus to the soldiers of the World War as provided by the bill H. R. 7726 as amended will be a direct benefit to people in all walks of life. I believe this bill as finally passed by the House of Representatives will, if enacted into law, provide for a needed expansion of the currency in a practical way which will benefit all parts of the country.

Money is subject to the economic laws of supply and demand. When it becomes scarce its value increases, and the price of commodities fall. This is the condition which now confronts this country. In testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives (hearings, p. 747) it was shown that less than half of the total money outstanding in the United States is in actual use. It was further shown (p. 51) that it would be possible to issue as much as $3,500,000,000 of new currency against the present gold reserve of the United States without bringing that gold reserve below the 40 per cent minimum required by law.

The Director of Research and Statistics of the Federal Reserve Board stated, that the total amount of money that does not do any actual business is $2,900,000,000 and that the active money is only about $2,500,000,000. Of the money that is inactive it was testified that about one and three-quarter billions is hoarded, and that there is about a hundred millions estimated to have been destroyed in various ways. In other words, the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee shows that less than half of the money which should be in circulation through the channels of business is now in circulation. There are several reasons for this but I do not propose to encroach on the time of the House by discussing these causes further than to state that those who deal in money as a commodity, the so-called Wall Street and international banking interests, those who have in their possession or under their control most of the money and credit in the United States, are deriving benefit from this money panic, for it is making their holdings of money more valuable. As commodity prices go down the value of money correspondingly increases, which is, of course, beneficial to these financial interests.

It is, I believe, a significant fact, that this bill is in the main being opposed by these financial interests who fear it will break their grip on the control of money in this country.

As the economic situation now exists, those who contracted debts only a few years ago can not hope to pay those debts with the high-priced money of to-day. 6-cent tobacco, 25-cent wheat, 20-cent corn, 3-cent hogs, 11-cent butterfat, 9-cent eggs mean that a dollar is two or three times more difficult to obtain to-day to pay off these debts than when the debts were contracted. In other words, a debt of a thousand dollars has become a debt of twenty-five hundred or three thousand dollars, as measured in terms of the commodity prices received by those who have to pay these debts.

Taxes which were burdensome in the extreme when money was comparatively cheap are impossible of payment with the expensive money we have to-day.

An expansion of the currency—in other words, a cheapening of money—is the only way of raising the prices of the products the farmer has to sell. "Honest money," as Mr. RAMSEYER and others have termed it, is what we need. By the bonus bill as passed by the House of Representatives we have a safe, practical way of bringing about something like "honest money." Its most fair and just distribution of this money, which will go into every nook and corner of our country and which is here proposed to be used in paying a just debt which should have been paid in 1919, makes this plan for inflation of the currency not only practical but just.

The following table shows the amounts of money, as estimated by the United States Veterans' Bureau and recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 18, 1932, that each of the six counties of the sixth Ohio district would receive from the payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates.

Scioto	$1,440,048.33
Adams	361,355.13
Brown	357,224.04
Clermont	528,105.78
Highland	450,625.68
Pike	246,021.48
Total	3,383,380.44

This money would do more to revive business in my district than any legislative measure which has so far been passed by this Congress. It will not only benefit the veteran who receives it first, but it will be passed on to the farmer, the "butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker." In fact economists estimate that for every veteran who receives payment, nine others will be benefited thereby.

Furthermore, this measure puts into operation the principles contained in the Glass-Steagall bill, which was recently passed by the Congress. When this measure was under consideration it received the almost unanimous support of business interests everywhere. It provided for an issue of circulating medium, 60 per cent of which is of identically the same character as is proposed in this bill. There is 40 per cent of gold, as a reserve back of the circulating medium authorized under the Glass-Steagall bill, but 60 per cent of that medium has for its soundness and its stability, only the soundness and stability that go with the Government of the United States. That is identically the same standing and soundness, it is identically the same character of credit, identically the same character of obligation, identically the same protection as in the case of the issuance of the $2,400,000,000 under this bonus bill.

It is my belief that small banks, building and loan associations, merchants, business men, and the public generally, will be benefited by an orderly cheapening of money; in other words, by an inflation of the currency as provided in this bill. Such inflation will cause a rise in commodity prices. People buy things when prices are rising. Falling prices create fear, and cause a sort of paralysis of business, for everyone is waiting to avail himself of the lowest prices before he buys commodities, and therefore little business can be transacted during a period of falling prices. On the other hand, when prices are rising there is a corresponding stimulation to business activities, which would be very beneficial at this time.

The argument has been advanced that this debt is not due until 1945; that the veteran has entered into a contract with the Government that he will not be paid until 1945; that because of this existing contract, the veteran has no right to ask for payment now.

Let us examine the history of the last few years and see if the veterans have any precedents upon which to base their claim for immediate payment in cash of these adjusted-service certificates.

At the close of the World War foreign governments owed us about $12,090,677,000. They were under contract to pay us this sum which we had loaned to them. Notwithstanding this solemn contract, we acceded to their demands and canceled this entire sum of over $12,000,000,000. This is the first precedent I wish to cite in favor of the veterans' demands at this time. While there was no serious objection raised to canceling a debt of over $12,000,000,000 of the foreign countries who had gotten us into the World War, we now receive a storm of protest because we propose to pay our soldiers about one-fifth that much, a sum which should have been paid at the time their service was rendered, instead of waiting until 1945, 27 years after the armistice was signed.

Second. I wish to cite the bonus of $529,000,000 given to the railroads of the country after the World War, which figure was arrived at by allowing them 6 per cent interest upon greatly inflated appraisals of their losses as a result of Government ownership and operation during the period of the war. They were paid in cash.

Third. I wish to call your attention to the way in which our Government dealt with the contractors who had built cantonments and who had contracts for war materials and supplies when the war ended. These contractors were making tremendous profits out of the war. They said, "You closed the war too soon for us; you quit fighting; we have these contracts, and it is going to cost us some money. We need a bonus. We need adjusted compensation." Congress immediately paid it. The sum of approximately $3,000,000,000 was allowed by Congress to the war contractors as adjustments on their profiteering contracts for war materials and supplies. This was a change in binding contracts which led to immediate payment of approximately $600,000,000 more than the entire cost of the soldiers' bonus figured on the 1945 value.

Since the closing of the war adjustments have been made in the taxes paid by the great corporations and wealthy individuals of this country, and refunds have already been made to them totaling nearly $4,000,000,000, exceeding by one billion six hundred millions the total amount asked by the veterans.

Then, coming down to this recent summer, our President asked and was given authority by Congress to grant a $250,000,000 moratorium on European interest payments which were due and could have been collected under the original contracts. These are all precedents which, in my humble judgment, are clearly in line with the present proposal to pay the soldiers' adjusted certificates now.

Then we should consider the further fact that these other payments were made in cash, not in an insurance policy due 20 years after the service was renderd. Furthermore, the original debt was due when the service was rendered, from 1917 to 1919, and the veteran should have been paid at that time or have been allowed interest at 6 per cent as was granted the railroads in their bonus, and this interest should have begun to run at the time the service was rendered instead of in 1925.

It should also be recognized that the bonus payments as granted to be paid in 1945, were based on the lowest estimated rate of pay for unskilled labor during the war, namely, $60 a month, making the bonus for each day of home service $1 and for foreign service $1.25 a day. These ridiculously low wage adjustments for the veterans' risk of life and future health are, in my humble judgment, in themselves sufficient grounds to justify immediate cash payment.

It seems to me that the fundamental question involved in the veterans' demand that these adjusted-service certificates be paid in cash now, and the determined opposition which has manifested itself against this proposal is another example of the age-old conflict between human rights and property rights. When the demands were made upon Congress to pay the railroads, the war contractors, and to cancel the debts owed us by foreign countries, the question was fundamentally a question of property rights. It involved the money value of stocks and bonds, in the value of securities owned by the international bankers; and no burden placed upon the taxpayers of America to safeguard their interests was considered too heavy. Now the war veterans come with a similar demand because many of them, their parents, their wives, and children are suffering because of a lack of the bare necessities of life and ask the Congress of the United States to do for them what it did 12 or 13 years ago for those business interests which suffered no hardships because of the war.

Because it is alleged that this proposed immediate payment to these war veterans of this debt which was due in 1919 will cause some financial loss to these same business interests, they are throwing all their influence toward having this worthy measure defeated. As for myself, I shall continue to follow the Democratic principle, that human rights are more important than property rights, that man is more important than money.

In conclusion, may I again remind the House that the passage of this legislation will not take any money from the Treasury, and will not affect adversely the balancing of the Budget; neither will it place one cent additional tax burden upon our people. Furthermore, the settlement of this debt at this time on the basis provided in this bill will save the sum of about $100,000,000 a year to the Treasury from now until 1945, as this amount is now required to be appropriated each year to meet the necessary sinking fund requirement. For these reasons I am glad to support and vote for the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, in deciding the question of the payment of the so-called bonus, the task of a Member of Congress is difficult: "He is damned if he does, and he is damned if he doesn't." He must, above all, consider the welfare of the entire country as well as the welfare of his own immediate district, and of the veterans in particular. He can not be a mere weathercock to register the views of the people back home. That might lead to legislation which would disrupt and destroy the welfare of countless thousands in the rest of the country.

To-day the Nation's Treasury is empty. It is worse than empty. We face a staggering deficit. At the end of the fiscal year that deficit may be over $3,000,000,000. To vote for the full payment of the bonus would increase that deficit by $2,400,000,000. No country in peace time can with impunity withstand a deficit of $5,400,000,000.

Where is the money to come from? From taxes? We are taxing our people to the limit now. Ask your tax-ridden butcher, grocer, baker, small tradesman, your clerks, stenographers, the white-collared class, your truckmen, carpenters, plasterers, artisans, the Federal, State, and municipal employees. They are overburdened with direct and indirect taxes. Their salaries, their incomes, are lessened, sometimes to the vanishing point. The burden of taxation falls on them. They can not pay any more taxes. Although they may not know it, in their rents, in what they pay for goods, including clothing, shelter, and the necessities of life, they pay for income and other taxes which are included in the cost of these things. To vote for the bonus would be forcing them to pay now or hereafter the value thereof.

I must, therefore, consider all the people of my district, whether one is a taxi driver along Pitkin Avenue, a grocer or storekeeper on Reid Avenue, a peddler on Sutter Avenue, or a cigar man on Broadway. The veteran on Myrtle Avenue who is out of a job must be considered as well as the idle nonveteran on Gates Avenue. Only 13 per cent of all the unemployed are veterans; 87 per cent are nonveterans. If that same proportion holds in my own district, and I vote for the bonus, I shall be severely held accountable by the 87 per cent of the unemployed in my district who are nonveterans. I can not discriminate against them. All of the unemployed are the object of my concern.

The bonus bill as presented favored the rich veteran and the poor veteran alike. One of my colleagues offered an amendment to give the bonus only to the poor, unemployed veteran. I voted for this, but it was defeated. I repeat that all the poor or the unemployed are the object of my concern. To that end I voted in favor of all the unemployment relief measures—for the Glass-Steagall bill which would give greater credit to industry and therefore make more jobs, for the reconstruction finance bill to prevent banks from closing, thus keeping the wheels of industry revolving and as many workers as possible in their jobs. This measure has held in positions millions of persons, because it has helped the railroads and other large employers of labor.

I recently voted and battled for a bill to permit the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat by the American National Red Cross for the relief of the poor and needy. This past week I voted again for another 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to be distributed by the American National Red Cross, most of which is to be processed into flour and exchanged for other food to succor the needy and starving. I voted also for the distribution of one-half million bales of cotton to be manufactured into clothing for the poor and naked among us.

If the bonus would take care of most of our unemployed, I would be for it, but in this crisis I can not make an unjust distinction among those who are in the ranks of the poor and unfortunate who are unable to find work, just because they are veterans.

My sympathies are with the veterans, and I have transmuted that sympathy into action by voting for every veterans' bill that has come before Congress in the past 10 years. It was due to my votes, among others, that we are paying the veterans to-day $1 out of every $4 spent by the Government. The Government has already paid on account of the veterans of the World War, up to date, over $6,000,000,000, and if we continue at the present rate, with no increase of commitments, by 1945, the date scheduled for the payment of the bonus, we will probably have spent for the World War veterans $21,500,000,000. This would equal the total cost of our participation in the World War.

Previous to the World War we spent for veterans of all other wars, up to date, only $8,000,000,000. The average citizen has no idea of the vast amount of money involved in these figures. But consider, if you were given a dollar for every minute since the beginning of the present era, that is, since the beginning of the year 1 down to date, the total amount would not even equal the unearned interest on the soldiers' bonus which is due in 1945. This unearned interest amounts to $1,300,000,000. All these figures, reaching into billions, are inconceivable. They dwarf the remoteness of the sun or the number of years it would take a beam of light to reach us from Pluto, the planet farthest from the earth; it is in fact 3,000,000,000 miles away.

I can not turn my eyes from human suffering caused by unemployment, but if anything is done to alleviate this condition, we must do it all over the country on a nation-wide scale, with billions of money behind it for the construction of public buildings and public works. We must make the dirt fly immediately. In this connection I voted for the Garner bill, providing for the spending of billions for public works construction, which will employ thousands of workers, and I shall work for the Wagner bill which does the same thing.

These words are being written subsequent to my vote in the House against the bonus. Since then the Senate by an overwhelming vote of 18 to 62 defeated it. My views were again approved by the adverse votes against this bill by Senators WAGNER and COPELAND. These Members, with Senators WALSH and COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts, issued the following statement:

We have supported and will continue to support all measures for the compensation and relief of disabled soldiers. We always urged and voted for a cash payment or bonus instead of the adjusted-compensation certificates. We believed this to be the fairest way of meeting the inadequacy of the Government's compensation to its soldiers during the World War.

The proposition as it is presented to us, however, is not to pay the veterans the cash surrender value that may be due. We favor that. It is a proposal to pay the veterans $2,400,000,000, including 12 years' interest not yet due for certificates not payable until 1945. It is also a request that the taxpayers of the country advance the interest on these certificates that may be earned during the next 12 years. This represents an absolute gift of $1,635,000,000, which is the exact amount over and above the present value of the certificates.

If the country were prosperous and free from the danger of an economic breakdown, we could defend this vast expenditure, in view of the distressed condition of many veterans. But, unfortunately, the veterans are not the only unemployed sufferers; millions of other Americans are in the same sad plight. But even this situation would ordinarily justify preference to the veterans.

However, a much more important obstacle prevents our approval—an obstacle that can not be waived aside without most serious consequences to the whole country. The condition of the Public Treasury and the serious menace to the credit of our Nation make it impossible to act favorably on this measure without bringing financial ruin to the country. To take this action now would, in our opinion, produce financial chaos.

Our opportunities to study this problem give us an understanding of what may happen to individual credit, to bank accounts no matter how small, to home mortgages, to insurance companies, and other savings institutions. It means prolonging and intensifying unemployment and an increase in suffering for those who pray for the reopening of shop and factory and a restoration of building and trade. We sincerely believe the relief of the veterans would be offset a hundred times by the increase in hunger and suffering throughout the land.

The Federal Treasury is the last hope of a distressed people. Upon this we must depend if all else fails. It may prove our only hope to save the people from starvation. If the Nation's credit is further contracted, as this proposal is certain to do, the depression may continue indefinitely, with even the danger of our institutions, financial and political, being irreparably impaired.

That we shall need an unimpaired Treasury next winter no one can question. We propose that when the call comes for that last-ditch aid the Federal Treasury shall not fail the hungry, the suffering, and the destitute.

Against all the dictates of our personal desire, and after long and most serious consideration, we have concluded we would be unfaithful to our public trust and our obligation to all the people if we were to support the pending bonus measure.

If further authority for my viewpoint is desired, let me quote to you the resolution adopted by the American Legion at their last national convention:

Whereas the unqualified, generous, and unstinted relief of our disabled comrades has always been and ever will be the task to which the American Legion is chiefly dedicated, and is the surest path for service to God and country; and

Whereas the American Legion, having never demanded gratuity for the able, but now, as always, unrelenting and determined in its solicitation for succor by a grateful Government for those disabled in its service, protests any proposed economy at their expense, but

Whereas millions of men and billions of dollars and of property can not be destroyed except the survivors be called upon for sacrifice and self-denial to make good the loss which has visited service-connected disability upon all mankind; and

Whereas the Nation to-day faces an economic and financial crisis which calls for sound, unselfish, and patriotic action on the part of all America: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, in full possession of its limitless faith in the destiny of the Nation we fought to preserve, calls upon the able-bodied men of America, rich and poor, veteran and civilian and statesmen, to refrain from placing unnecessary burdens upon National, State, or municipal Governments, and to unite their efforts as they all did in 1917 to the end that the war against depression be victoriously concluded, prosperity and happiness restored.

During the consideration of the bonus bill I offered an amendment to pay the soldiers the surrender value of the adjusted-compensation certificates as of date. I asked the Veterans' Administration to figure out for me, as an actual basis, what it would cost to pay the veterans this cash-surrender value, less whatever amounts the veterans may have borrowed on their certificates. The following figures include the cost of the surrender value of the policies or adjusted-compensation certificates with the additional 25 per cent per diem allowance figured up to 1945:

The following calculation is as of June 30, 1932:

Amount appropriated[1]	$1,096,000,000.00
Interest earned (investments and loans)	150,506,989.66
	1,246,506,989.66
Payments (matured certificates, redemptions, etc.)	133,951,446.50
Value of fund	1,112,555,543.16
Present value outstanding certificates (on basis of allowing earned portion of additional credit granted because of deferred payment)	1,879,331,854.00
Amount appropriated (act of June 30, 1932)	100,000,000.00
Additional amount necessary to pay present value of adjusted-service certificates	666,776,310.84

It will be noted that taking into consideration the $100,000,000 appropriated by the act of June 30, 1932, it will be necessary to appropriate $666,776,310.84 additional to pay the present value of these adjusted-service certificates. The average bonus certificate would be worth in 1945 about $625. The average borrowing thereon is about $525. Thus each man would receive an average of about $100 under my plan.

I was anxious to bring this payment about, but my colleagues did not see eye for eye with me on this matter. While many voted with me, there were not sufficient to constitute a majority of those present in the House.

[1] This does not include the $100,000,000 provided for in the current pending appropriation bill to be credited to this certificate fund. If this were added, the amount necessary to be provided by current appropriation or current funding in order to pay cash value of outstanding certificates, as of May 31, 1932, would be $669,000,000.

I would pay this $669,000,000, first, by legalizing the sale of beer and light wines. The revenue derived therefrom would be more than ample to pay it. If necessary, however, I would cut further the expenditures of Government, but that would be the limit to which I would go in aid of the veterans at this time. Later, when conditions have become better, I would be more generous and aid the veterans to the fullest.

A TAX ON CORPORATION "SURPLUS INCOMES"

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a bill which I introduced to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, to-day I introduced a bill, H. R. 12643, to tax the accumulated surplus of corporations. The bill is designed to reach the income of our large corporations which they are concealing and withholding from both their stockholders and the Government through fanciful reserves for depreciation and depletion. Some of the abuses which the act is intended to prevent are indicated in section 5 (b).

This act would raise within the next five months between $400,000,000 and $700,000,000 of new revenues from sources which are unjustly and artfully escaping taxation. For example, it would collect some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 from the 1931 income of the United States Steel Corporation, which had actual net income of around $100,000,000 in 1931, and reported net income of over $60,000,000 before "reserves," but provided only $80,000 for Federal income tax, as is shown on pages 6 and 18 of their annual report. The financial troubles of the United States Government are largely traceable to this sort of tax evasion by our large corporations, which the act is primarily designed to remedy.

For 1932 and subsequent years this act would raise some six hundred to one thousand millions of revenue annually. Incidentally it provides "dividend credits" which would operate powerfully to prevent the cutting of dividends and the reductions of wages which frequently accompany dividend cuts.

To prevent hardships the act grants a specific exemption of $500,000 income to each corporation or affiliated group of corporations, and wholly exempts banking and insurance institutions. The act will thus apply to less than 1,000 corporations out of the 500,000 which report to the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Conservative restrictions are placed on the deduction of "reserves," although deduction for all actual replacements is permitted. Liberal credit is also provided for dividends distributed, and by all these means the act is limited to the great corporations whose hoarding of funds has notoriously contributed to the depression.

The act provides also for reduction of normal tax rates from 4 per cent and 8 per cent to 1 per cent and 2 per cent. In addition it establishes credits for taxes paid to the States—like the credit now allowed against Federal estate taxes—thus rendering substantial assistance to the States in tax collection, and incidentally relieving further the tax burden upon individuals. The estimates above given as to the productiveness of the tax are after allowance for these tax reductions and credits.

The proposed rate of taxation, 33⅓ per cent, is high, but not in comparison with the newly established surtax rates. Without such an increase in the rate of corporate income taxation, the new surtaxes will be universally evaded, except by salaried and professional classes. On the other hand, such high corporate rates are made practicable and justifiable only by the liberal credits allowed in the act to both corporations and individuals, and particularly by the elimination of existing double taxation of dividends. This measure rectifies the present disparity between individual and corporate rates, and at the same time furnishes the means through which an early reduction of surtax rates may be attempted.

The proposed act offers the advantages of a sales tax without some of its disadvantages. A sales tax, unless shifted to the consumer, is simply a tax on gross income without deductions. This act permits deduction of all direct costs and also all actual overhead expenses, disallowing only certain overhead reserves which have been abused and are unnecessary.

The tax on corporate surplus income can not be pyramided or shifted to the consumer. It will not add one cent to the cost of doing business. It will encourage liberal dividend and wage increases, thereby enlarging the buying power of the public. Without any inflation, it will presently force a half billion dollars of existing money into circulation—money now held in stagnant surpluses of giant corporations. Careful study has shown that it will not impose undue strain on corporate finances to pay the tax for 1931 or later years, but the act contains novel provisions to insure against exceptional hardship in any case.

The tax is needed to relieve stockholders, rectify injustices, restore the national credit, provide for necessary relief measures, and relieve the pressure for Federal and corporation wage cuts. It is submitted that at this time few other measures could do more to restore confidence, revive business, and stimulate the normal flow of money and commodities in commerce.

The bill is as follows:

PROPOSED CORPORATE SURPLUS TAX ACT

SECTION 1. Application of act: The provisions of this act shall apply only to the taxable year 1931 and succeeding taxable years. In respect of the taxable year 1931, all references in this act to the revenue act of 1932 or any section or provision thereof shall be deemed to refer to the revenue act of 1928 or the corresponding section or provision thereof, unless otherwise indicated by the context.

TITLE I. CORPORATE SURPLUS TAX

SEC. 2. Corporate surplus tax: (a) Rate of tax.—In addition to any tax imposed by other acts now or hereafter in force, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the taxable year 1931, and for each taxable year thereafter, upon the surplus income of every corporation, a tax of 33⅓ per cent of the amount of such surplus income, as defined in sections 3 and 4 hereof. Such tax shall be known as the corporate surplus tax.

(b) Exempt corporations.—All banks, trust companies, and other banking institutions, all insurance companies, and all organizations exempted from income taxation by section 103 of the revenue act of 1932 shall be exempt from the tax imposed hereby.

SEC. 3. Surplus income: For the purposes of this act "surplus income" means the gross income computed under section 22 of the revenue act of 1932, less the deductions allowed by section 4 hereof.

SEC. 4. Deductions from gross income: In computing surplus income there shall be allowed the following deductions:

(a) All the deductions specified in section 23 of the revenue act of 1932, except as otherwise provided in sections 5 and 7 (b) hereof.

(b) The amount received as interest upon obligations of the United States heretofore issued which is included in gross income under section 22 of the revenue act of 1932, but only if and to the extent that such interest is exempt from the corporate surplus tax by virtue of the respective acts authorizing the issue of such obligations, as amended and supplemented;

(c) In the case of a domestic corporation, a specific deduction of $500,000: Provided, That the total deductions under this subsection (c) for a group of corporations affiliated as defined in section 6 (a) hereof shall not exceed $500,000 and shall be prorated among them in proportion to their net incomes as computed before any deductions under this subsection (c) or under the following subsection (d); and

(d) In the case of a domestic corporation or group of corporations so affiliated, one-half of the amount by which all dividends actually paid in cash by it to stockholders during the taxable year (exclusive of intercompany dividends in an affiliated group) shall exceed the aggregate of dividends (other than stock dividends) received by it in such taxable year: Provided, That if the dividends so paid were less in amount than four-fifths of the dividends so paid in the year preceding the taxable year, no deduction shall be taken or allowed under this subsection (d) unless the commissioner shall, upon application and due proof, have first determined that the reduction in such dividends was reasonably necessary and not designed to avoid surtaxes or to restrain interstate or foreign commerce by means of manipulating stock or commodity prices or wage rates. Every such application and all proceedings had thereon shall be open to the public.

SEC. 5. Items not deductible: (a) In computing surplus income for any taxable year ending on or before September 30, 1932, no deduction shall be made for depreciation (including exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence) of tangible assets having at their date of acquisition a probable useful life of more than four years.

(b) In computing surplus income for any taxable year ending after September 30, 1932, deductions for depreciation (including exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence), and depletion (including depletion of discovery values and percentage depletion as defined in section 114(b) of the revenue act of 1932), shall not be allowed, except that a reasonable allowance for such depreciation and depletion shall be deductible where the major portion of the value of an asset is likely to be exhausted within two years from the date of its acquisition by the taxpayer. This provision shall be liberally construed to effect its purpose of preventing abuses which have developed, such as arbitrary and excessive reserves, distortion of income accounts, and concealment of income through straight-line methods of calculating depreciation in periods of reduced output, duplication of deductions for maintenance and replacements, fictitious bases for "discovery" and "percentage" depletion, and errors and corruption in appraising properties, estimating their recoverable contents and useful life, and allocating reserves as between taxable periods.

(c) In computing surplus income no deduction shall in any case be allowed in respect of—

(1) Any amount paid out for new buildings or for permanent improvements or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate; or

(2) Any amount expended in restoring property or in making good the exhaustion thereof for which an allowance is or has been made for any other taxable period under the revenue act of 1932 or any income tax act previously or subsequently in force.

SEC. 6. Affiliated corporations: (a) For the purposes of section 4(c) and section 4(d) hereof two or more corporations shall be deemed affiliated (1) if one corporation owns directly or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees over 50 per cent of the stock of the other or others, or (2) if over 50 per cent of the stock of two or more corporations is owned or controlled by the same interests.

(b) For all other purposes, affiliations shall be determined and consolidated or separate returns may be filed, in like manner and with like effect (except as to the rate of tax) as provided in section 141 of the revenue act of 1932.

SEC. 7. Credits against the tax: (a) Taxes of foreign countries and possessions of the United States.—The tax imposed by this act shall be credited with all the credits specified in section 131 of the revenue act of 1932, except to the extent that a credit therefor against income taxes, or a deduction thereof in computing net income, shall have been allowed under the revenue act of 1928 or 1932 or any income tax act hereafter enacted.

(b) Certain taxes paid to States after taxable year 1931: The tax imposed by this act for any taxable year ending after December 31, 1931, shall also be credited with one-third of all amounts which shall be actually paid by the taxpayer (whether before or after making the return hereunder) for taxes for such taxable year to any State or States of the United States or any political subdivision thereof: Provided, That such credit shall not exceed one-third of the tax otherwise computed hereunder, that any amount so credited shall be disallowed as a deduction in computing surplus income hereunder, and that for the taxable year 1934, and any year thereafter this credit shall be allowed only for taxes so paid in respect of the income of the taxable year or as franchise taxes measured or determined with reference to such income.

SEC. 8. Returns for corporate surplus tax: Returns for corporate surplus tax, in such form as the commissioner may prescribe, shall be made in like manner and under like conditions and penalties, as are or shall be provided in respect of corporation income taxes by sections 52, 141, and 235 of the revenue act of 1932 and by other provisions of said act. Such returns shall be filed for the taxable year 1931 and each taxable year thereafter, by every corporation not exempt under section 2 (b) and having for such year any surplus income taxable under this act or a net income in excess of $100,000 as determined under the revenue act of 1932.

SEC. 9. Returns and payment of tax for 1931: (a) Returns for the taxable year 1931 (i. e., for the calendar year 1931, or the taxpayer's fiscal year ended in 1931, as the case may be), shall be made on or before August 15, 1932 (or within such extended period as the commissioner may prescribe in accordance with sec. 53 of the revenue act of 1932).

(b) The tax imposed by this act for the taxable year 1931 shall be payable in three equal installments, the first installment on August 15, 1932, the second installment on October 15, 1932, and the third installment on November 15, 1932 (or within such extended period or periods as the commissioner may prescribe in accordance with sec. 56 of the revenue act of 1932 or sec. 11 of this act). If any installment is not paid on or before the date fixed for its payment, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall be paid upon notice and demand from the collector.

SEC. 10. Returns and payment for subsequent years: Returns for any taxable year ending after December 31, 1931, shall be made at such time as is specified in respect of income taxes by section 53 or 235, as the case may be, of the revenue act of 1932 (or within such extended period as the commissioner may prescribe in accordance with sec. 53 thereof), and the tax imposed by this act for any such taxable year shall be payable at such time or times and in such installments and on such conditions as are specified in respect of income taxes in section 56 or 236, as the case may be, of the revenue act of 1932: Provided, That the return for any fiscal year ending in 1932 prior to August 31, 1932, need not be made until November 15, 1932, and the quarterly installments of tax therefor shall be payable on November 15, 1932, and February 15, May 15, and August 15, 1933.

SEC. 11. Relief in cases of special hardship: (a) Where the payment by any taxpayer of all or any part of the tax imposed hereby on the due dates thereof would impose exceptional hardship, the commissioner shall (in addition to any period or periods not exceeding six months granted pursuant to section 56 (c) of the revenue act of 1932) further extend the time for payment of the tax or such part thereof for such period or periods (not extending beyond two years from the original due dates of the tax) as shall be reasonably necessary.

(b) Interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum shall be collected upon the tax in accordance with section 295 of the revenue act of 1932 for any period of extension under said section 56 (c), and in case of any extension under this section there shall further be collected as part of the tax interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent per month or fraction thereof from the expiration of such extension under section 56 (c) until the same shall be paid.

(c) No bond or other security shall be required for any extension in respect of the tax imposed hereby, whether under said section 56 (c) or under this section.

(d) If it shall appear that the solvency of any taxpayer or its financial ability to continue business, or the safety of creditors or others transacting business with such taxpayer, might be materially affected by payment of the tax when due, the commissioner shall, in addition to granting any extension or extensions under subdivision (a) of this section, issue to such taxpayer a certificate waiving any and all liens in favor of the United States in respect of the tax or any part thereof for which such extension shall be granted, and subordinating to the claims of existing creditors and of all who shall become creditors during the period or periods of such extension, all claims of the United States for or in respect of the tax or the part thereof for which such extension shall have been granted, including interest.

(e) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed and applied in favor of taxpayers, with a view primarily to the preservation of business interests rather than the collection of revenue in cases of exceptional hardship. Any denial of relief or any other action by the commissioner under this section, whether in whole or in part, shall be subject to judicial review and control notwithstanding the provisions of section 3224 of the Revised Statutes and section 604 of the revenue act of 1928.

SEC. 12. Laws made applicable: Titles I and IX of the revenue act of 1932 (except sec. 102 thereof), Titles III, IV, and V of the revenue act of 1928, Title IX of the revenue act of 1924 as amended, Titles X and XI and section 1203 of the revenue act of 1926 as amended (including all definitions contained in said acts), and all administrative and special provisions of law, including the law relating to assessment of taxes, so far as applicable and not inconsistent herewith, are hereby extended to and made a part of this act.

TITLE II. RELIEF FOR INDIVIDUAL TAXPAYERS

SEC. 13. Reduction of normal tax rates: Section 11 of the revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 11. Normal tax on individuals: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(a) 1 per cent of the first $4,000 of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 25; and

"(b) 2 per cent of the remainder of such excess amount."

SEC. 14. Dividend credit to individuals against income tax.

(a) The revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended by adding a new section thereto, to be known as section 32–A, as follows:

"SEC. 32–A. Dividend credit against tax: In the case of an individual the tax shall be credited with 16⅔ per cent of the amount received as dividends in cash after December 31, 1931—

"(1) from a domestic corporation which is subject to taxation under this title, or

"(2) from a foreign corporation when it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that more than 50 per cent of the gross income of such foreign corporation for the 3-year period ending with the close of its taxable year preceding the declaration of such dividends (or for such part of such period as the corporation has been in existence) was derived from sources within the United States as determined under the provisions of section 119.

"The credit allowed by this subsection shall not be allowed in respect of dividends received from a corporation organized under the China trade act, 1922, or from a corporation which under section 251 is taxable only on its gross income from sources within the United States by reason of its receiving a large percentage of its gross income from sources within a possession of the United States. In the case of any individual who is a member of a partnership his tax shall be credited with 16⅔ per cent of his proportionate share of such dividends received after December 31, 1931, by the partnership. In the case of any individual who is a legatee, heir, or beneficiary of an estate or trust, his tax shall be credited with 16⅔ per cent of such portion of such dividends received after December 31, 1931, by the estate or trust as is required to be included in computing his net income, and the tax of the estate or trust shall be credited with 16⅔ per cent of any remaining portion of such dividends."

(b) Subsection (a) of section 25 of the revenue act of 1932, providing for a credit of dividends against income in computing the normal tax, is hereby repealed.

(c) In section 163 (a) and (b) and section 184 of the revenue act of 1932, relating to credits against net income in the cases of estates, trusts, and partnerships, the words "dividends and" are hereby stricken out, wherever they occur, and the words "(a) and" are hereby stricken out from the phrase "section 25 (a) and (b)," wherever they occur.

SEC. 15. Credit to individuals for State taxes: The revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended by adding a new section thereto, to be known as section 32–B as follows:

"SEC. 32–B. Credit to individuals for State and local taxes: In the case of an individual the tax shall also be credited with all amounts, up to but not exceeding 3 per cent of the net income for the taxable year, which shall be actually paid by the taxpayer (whether before or after making the return hereunder) for taxes for such taxable year to any State or States of the United States or any political subdivision thereof: Provided, That any amount so credited shall not be deductible in computing income under section 23, and that for the taxable year 1934 and any year thereafter this credit shall be allowed only for taxes so paid in respect of the income of such year."

SEC. 16. Normal tax on nonresident alien individuals: Section 211 (b) of the revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) Aliens resident in contiguous countries—In the case of an alien individual resident in a contiguous country, the normal tax shall be an amount equal to the sum of the following:

"(1) One per cent of the amount by which the part of the net income attributable to wages, salaries, professional fees, or other amounts received as compensation for personal services actually performed in the United States, exceeds the personal exemption and credit for dependents; but the amount taxable at such 1 per cent rate shall not exceed $4,000; and

"(2) Two per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the sum of (A), the amount taxed under paragraph (1) of this subsection, plus (B), the total credits against net income allowed to such individual."

SEC. 17. Dividend credit to nonresident alien individuals: Section 216 of the revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 216. Credits against tax: A nonresident alien individual shall not be allowed the credits against the tax for taxes of foreign countries and possessions of the United States allowed by section 131, but shall be allowed the credit against the tax for 16⅔ per cent of dividends received in cash after December 31, 1931, as provided in section 32–A."

SEC. 18. Withholding of income tax at the source: Section 143 (b) of the revenue act of 1932 is hereby amended by substituting the words: "(other than income received as dividends of the class described in section 32–A)," in lieu of the words "(other than income received as dividends of the class allowed as a credit by section 25 (a))."

TITLE III. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 19. Separability clause: If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 20. This act shall take effect upon its enactment.

I believe any question of the constitutionality of the foregoing bill is answered by the following authorities:

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE PROPOSED TAX

The fairest measure of present ability to contribute to the revenues is to be found in the past year's earnings. So far as the retroactive feature of the tax is concerned, its constitutionality seems clear, under the doctrine of Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (1916) (240 U. S. 1).

The disallowance of depreciation and depletion is justified by Burnet v. Thompson Oil & Gas Co. (1931) (283 U. S. 301, 304), United States v. Biwabik Mining Co. (1918) (247 U. S. 116), Goldfield Consolidated Mines Co. v. Scott (1918) (247 U. S. 126), and Cf. Weiss v. Wener (1929) (279 U. S. 333, 335).

In addition depreciation and depletion deductions were expressly or tactily disallowed in the Civil War income tax laws and the law of 1894, yet no point was made of this by the learned counsel who argued the Pollock case. (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (1895), 157 U. S. 429, 158 U. S. 601; Railroad Co. v. Collector (1879), 100 U. S. 595, 597; Bailey v. Railroad Co. (1882), 106 U. S. 109, 115.)

As was observed in a note to the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in Missouri ex rel. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. v. Public Service Comm. ((1923), 262 U. S. 276, 294):

Several different methods are used for measuring depreciation: (1) The replacement method; (2) the straight-line method; (3) the compound-interest method; (4) the sinking-fund method; (5) the unit-cost method. It is largely a matter of judgment whether and to what extent any one of these several methods of measuring depreciation should be applied. They may give widely different results.

PAYMENT OF THE BONUS

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the debate upon the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates to the veterans it has been made clear that the main problem involved in this proposal is the establishment of a sound method for the immediate cash payment of these claims. Sympathy for the veteran in his present distress and a desire to render justice to the men who served their country so valiantly during the crisis of the great World War are not lacking on the part of Members of Congress. While we act to secure justice for the veteran we can not forget that there rests upon us at the same time as the Representatives of the people of this country the grave responsibility to safeguard the integrity and stability of the financial institutions of the country.

During this period especially when widespread economic distress exists throughout the land it is highly important for us to be conscious of our solemn duty as the trustees of the people to adopt only those measures that are wise and sound and which will least subject the financial structure of the country to further economic strain.

There is no greater need in our country at this moment than the restoration of genuine confidence in the fundamental integrity of our Government and its financial system. If the security of our financial system can be maintained through a system of sound financing of the bonus payments, this obligation of the Government should be discharged at once. It is not only a matter of sympathy for the veteran but also a matter of concern for the financial welfare of the country itself.

In my own case my signature upon the petition to discharge the committee which made possible a vote upon the bonus question and my vote to discharge the committee in order that the matter could be passed upon directly by Congress itself are ample evidence of my sympathy toward the proposition itself and an expression of my desire to find a method of financing the payments that would be sound and practicable. But I am compelled to vote against the bill in its present form because I have not been convinced that it is wise at this time to pass the proposed measure with its unsound scheme of financing and I am unable to reconcile myself to the payment of these certificates in inflated currency. The money which the veteran is now getting is not great but it is good money and I am unwilling to cheapen the money of our country in order to pay the balance due him now.

Our country is confronted with an economic and financial crisis of the gravest character. Unless the trend toward improvement becomes established during the next few months, the situation in this country which is even now alarming may become more critical and more fraught with danger than at the present time and may make imperative relief and emergency measures of the most drastic character.

To print paper money to the extent of $2,400,000,000, or to issue such money against a bond issue similarly unsecured except by the mere promise of the Government to pay is direct inflation of the currency of the most vicious sort and is highly unsound and unwise. The reserve strength of the Government rests upon a very narrow margin of safety. If we should exhaust this reserve strength at this time and then in a few months find our country facing a condition of destitution and distress that calls for emergency measures of the most urgent character, our Nation would find itself utterly helpless in the crisis, with its reserve gone and its currency inflated and the same desperate conditions which prevailed in Germany and other countries of Europe when their financial systems crashed during the period of postwar inflation.

It is unfair to the service man to place upon him the responsibility for the adoption of a scheme of currency inflation that may do the country a great deal of harm. If this obligation to pay the veteran his adjusted-compensation certificate is just, as it most certainly is, then it should be financed by any of the generally approved methods of finance that are above reproach. The discharge of the obligation should rest upon its own merits and should not be tied up with any scheme of unsound money. If currency inflation is to be made a part of the fiscal policy of our Government, this is a separate problem and should rest upon its own merits as such. If we are going to inflate the currency of the country and tinker with the monetary system, it is unfair to the service man to place upon him the responsibility for the adoption of such measures and the direful consequences that may result therefrom.

Payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates with inflated currency is unfair to the great number of the disabled veterans and those dependent upon them. Every month the Government sends out 1,400,000 checks to disabled veterans, widows, and others. It is not denied that the purchasing power of this money is reduced under the present scheme of financing the bonus payments and the burden of the payment is thus shifted from the able-bodied veteran to the shoulders of the more unfortunate disabled and their dependents.

The cause of the service man is just and should be justly met. The obligation to pay the adjusted-compensation certificate has been created and should be discharged at the earliest possible moment. Since the claim of the veteran is fair and just the Government should be equally fair in financing the payments in accordance with the approved methods of sound public finance and should not resort to a scheme of currency inflation which would endanger the financial security of our country.

SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short excerpt from the original report on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, there are four objections put forward to "paying the bonus" at the present time. The first one is that the certificates which the boys hold constitute a contract, and that the contract is not due; second, that we can not pay now; third, that if we pay the bonus we will unbalance the Budget; fourth, that we can not both pay the veterans and give a large amount of employment on public works. I intend to take these up in their order.

First. This is not a "bonus" at all; it is an adjusted compensation. That simply means that when Congress took the matter up in 1922, they admitted the obligation of the country to carry out the original agreement with the men before they entered the Army. Everybody will recall that the official expression and the general acceptance was that we would keep every soldier harmless economically. That is, we would, as nearly as possible, put him in such shape financially when the war was over as he might reasonably have expected to be in if he had not gone to the war. That was the agreement; that was the contract. It was under that agreement that these boys went into the Army.

We ought all to recall that we agreed to keep their jobs open for them. We cheered them when they went through the towns. Wherever the trains stopped our most motherly women and beautiful girls brought lunches and hot coffee; and the men who were left at home cheered them on their way.

During the entire war our obligation to these boys to make up for them the difference that they lost financially by going into the service was stressed by every speaker that went on the platform.

Unfortunately, when they came back very few of their jobs had been kept open for them. They were compelled to hustle for themselves, and they did. But public sentiment compelled both political parties to recognize the obligation which the Government owed these men. The people recognized then as they do now that a real contract existed at the time they enlisted, and that their part of the contract was fulfilled when they were mustered out. The Government so proposed it, the soldier so accepted it, the people indorsed that idea of it and finally compelled some action to be taken by Congress, though the action taken was in no wise a fulfillment of the actual contract. What Congress really did was to give these boys, without their consent, a 20-year rain check.

The amount agreed to as being due at the end of the war was an extra dollar a day for those who remained in America, and a dollar and a quarter a day for those who went over. In truth and in fact this was not a fair compensation and everybody knows it, and knew it then; because the boys who remained at home during the war made $5 a day, $10 a day, $15 a day, lived in ease and comfort, and without danger or exposure. These soldier boys were paid a dollar a day for service in America and a dollar and a quarter for service overseas.

The compensation added an equal amount as set by Congress in 1922. That made $2 a day for the men who served in America, and $2.50 a day for those who served overseas. In view of what the other boys received at home that is ridiculous; but while that amount was agreed to by Congress they put off payment for 20 years, which they had absolutely no right to do. The contract should have been carried out, and whatever amount was agreed on should have been paid cash in hand as soon after the period of service as possible.

The country was in great prosperity. Our war-made millionaires were running up tremendous profits on everything. Instead of paying the soldiers their adjusted compensation, as we ought to have done, as a part of the war debt, we gave them a 20-year rain check. They had not participated in making this second contract, they were simply handed these certificates. I am not overstating the case.

I am taking the privilege which was granted me by the Speaker, of making a part of this a short report written by Congressman Kitchin, and submitted as a minority report on March 20, 1922. I asked permission to insert this because it will reawaken us to conditions which by no means should be forgotten. I here insert this report:

[House Report 804, pt. 3, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session]

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

Mr. Kitchin, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following minority views (to accompany H. R. 10874):

Of the 8 Democratic minority members of the Ways and Means Committee, 3 voted against reporting the pending bill favorably and 5 voted to report it favorably but do not approve of many of its provisions.

In justice to the Democrats of the committee end of the House who shall vote for the bill, it must be remembered that no Democratic member of the committee was permitted to participate at any meeting either in the discussion or preparation of the bill, nor was any Democratic member allowed even to be present at any meeting for the discussion or consideration of the bill, so this bill is exclusively a barred-door Republican product.

The committee and the House being absolutely under the control of the Republicans, according to Republican methods, this is the only bill which any Democrat in the committee or in the House will be given a chance on which to vote.

So, under the Republican scheme, the proposition confronting the Democrats is: This bill or nothing. Many Democrats of the House prefer this bill to nothing, as it may be of some little possible aid to some needy veterans. Some prefer nothing to this bill.

We are confident that if the Democrats had control of the committee and the writing of a bonus bill was committed by the House to their charge they would have prepared and presented to Congress a bill far more just and satisfactory to both the veteran and the Government.

The undersigned are unanimous in the following views:

Undoubtedly a large majority of the Democrats and Republicans in Congress favor a bonus or adjusted compensation of some sort to the World War veterans of the United States, and undoubtedly the House will pass the pending bonus bill, provided the Republicans who profess the most devoted, affectionate, and exclusive friendship for the veteran have the courage to keep their repeated pledges to the members of the American Legion and defy President Harding and Secretary Mellon and the money power, whom they represent, in their violent opposition to a bonus.

We believe that President Harding and the Republicans were right in their first proposition, to wit, that whatever kind of bonus bill or compensation act should be passed, there should be included in it a specific levy of taxation for the payment thereof.

We believe and insist that the amount of the money bonus or service credit which Congress concludes is justly due the veteran should be paid in cash on demand, and we protest against the veteran be given, as is provided by the pending bill, a 20-year duebill or, as the Comptroller of the Currency calls it, a rain check, which he can pawn with some bank for a loan of only one-half of the amount which Congress by the bill confesses the Government justly owes him, provided, of course, he can get some bank to ignore and defy the administration in its advice to the banks not to loan a veteran a penny on such due bill or "certificate." If the Government justly owes the veteran an additional compensation, as the bill admits, why should it not treat him as it does its other current creditors, pay him on demand in cash? When our country needed his services and required of him sufferings and sacrifices of blood, limb, and life, he went, and willingly, at once. He did not demand an installment plan or delay of 20 years for his services and sacrifices.

The duebill, rain-check, borrow-money bonus mode of payment, as provided by the bill, is an insult to every World War veteran and a shameful discredit to Congress and the Nation. By the bill the veteran is given a scrap of paper and told to go out and hawk it from bank to bank in the hope, after being held up for a high rate of interest, of getting a little cash on it, not, however, to exceed 50 per cent of what the bill confesses the Government now justly owes him.

Should a grateful Nation, after by act of Congress it confesses that it justly owes him an amount as additional compensation for his sufferings and sacrifices and offerings of life and limb during the World War, permit the banks, in order for him to get a pittance in cash, to hold him up to the extent of from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000 in interest charges at the high rate of from 6 per cent to 8 per cent, when the Government, according to the reports in yesterday's papers, can and is now getting all the money it wants to pay its current and other expenses on its certificates of indebtedness at the rate of 4¼ per cent interest? Why should not the Government also issue certificates of indebtedness, borrow money at 4¼ per cent, and pay its indebtedness to the veteran, admitted by the bill to be absolutely just? Why give him a duebill or rain check, and then stab it in the back, as does the administration through its Comptroller of the Currency with the warning and advice: "Nonnegotiable—no bank should loan to any veteran a penny of money on it."

Every Republican member of the committee, when it provided in the bill for the veteran to borrow money from the banks on his duebill or "certificate," knew that the administration's Comptroller of the Currency, who is the supervisor of all the national banks, had publicly announced in an interview published in all the papers throughout the country that he was going to advise all the national banks in the United States to refuse to loan a penny of money on them. They knew, too, that the President was opposed to the payment of any bonus or adjusted compensation to the World War veterans except by a sales tax.

The proposition in the bill, with this attitude of the administration and its Comptroller of the Currency, is absolutely a "gold brick" handed to the veteran, and a plain violation of the wide-mouthed pledges daily made for the last two years by the Republicans to the World War veterans. So we are presented with the shameful spectacle of the party that aborted the war, divided our country's war associates, disgraced the peace, deluded the people, deceived the veteran, deserted the wounded, relieved the profiteer, reduced the millionaires' income tax, repealed the excess-profits tax on the profiteers, and which still maintains a blasphemous, bibulous bootlicker at the Court of St. James to besmirch with his drunken banquet babble the high war purposes of the American people and the inspiration of the American soldiers, now offers to redeem its reckless campaign pledge with an

I O U, designated a "certificate," which the administration has, in advance of its issue, fatally impeached and discredited.

They are not conscious of, they do not realize how the insulting, mortifying indignity involved in sending the soldier from the Capitol to hawk his duebill about the country from bank to bank in search of some bank which for a high rate of interest will ignore the administration's advice and loan him a few dollars on it.

The schemers, the conspirators, the assassins who stabbed the peace can never thrill with the ardor of the American soldier who crossed the sea to end war, singing, "We won't come back till it's over over there." Envenomed with envy during the war, they never felt that exultant thrill, and as they are incapable of appreciation they are not capable of rewarding such a service.

Their eyes have never seen the light of the torch of Flanders field. With the veteran and his needs they reveal their incompetence. They start and stop. They are for this to-day and for that to-morrow. They potter around in darkness, they fumble, they muff. Incapable of dealing with the economic situation, they have directly brought upon the American people the worst depression that ever came upon them. Equally incapable of dealing with the war-veteran situation, they stutter and stagger. Blind, they wander around. They pick it up and put it down. Their last condition is worse than their first. Their victory of November, 1920, has turned to ashes. The honey of March, 1921, has turned to the wormwood of March, 1922. With a bold and impudent effrontery they offer to the American soldiers not the glory of a complete victory or the tribute of the Nation's gratitude but a pawn ticket or a rain check. "How long, O Lord, how long!" cry the people unto Thee. "When wilt Thou deliver us from the body of this death?"

We favor and insist that whatever kind or sort of bonus or adjusted compensation Congress shall deem justly due the World War veteran should be paid out of the taxes specifically levied for such purpose upon the big incomes of the millionaires and multimillionaires, whose number has more than trebled and whose wealth has increased to the extent of many billions of dollars since the beginning of the war, and upon the conscienceless, excessive profits of the big monopolistic corporations, who have plundered and profiteered upon the people and the Government since January 1, 1916, to the extent of over $40,000,000,000 of net profits and who persist in continuing their profiteering. These millionaires and multimillionaires and corporations were the real financial beneficiaries of the war. Why should they not now be made to pay this additional expense of the war?

For this purpose we favor the reenactment of the surtax on the large incomes of these millionaires and multimillionaires which was repealed by the Republicans in their revenue act of 1921, and a reenactment of the excess-profits tax which was also repealed by them in said act, with a specific exemption of $50,000 instead of $3,000, as provided for in the act of 1918. By such exemption we would lose or sacrifice less than one-tenth of the excess-profits tax. In other words, heretofore corporations making an amount in excess of $50,000 yearly have been making nine-tenths of all the corporate incomes and have been paying nine-tenths of all the excess-profits taxes and will continue to make and pay in such proportion if we reenact the excess-profits tax as above set out for this unquestioned war liability.

Ten hundred and twenty-six corporations, with incomes each from five millions to five hundred millions, had several hundred millions more income yearly and paid several hundred millions more excess-profits tax annually than all the balance of the 317,000 corporations in the United States, and these are the corporations which have, during the war and since, and will continue, especially under Republican administrations, to profiteer and prey upon the people of the United States and the Government. By our method we propose to make them bear the largest portion of this additional expense for the World War veterans' adjusted compensation should Congress pass one.

Since the Republican Congress and administration, in its last tax bill, relieved from taxation the millionaires and multimillionaires to the extent of over $90,000,000 yearly, as estimated by the Treasury Department, on their big incomes; that is, reduced the rate of taxation on the incomes of the millionaires to that extent, and released to the big monopolistic corporations of this country, whose big stockholders are contributors to the Republican campaign funds, over $450,000,000, according to the Treasury's estimate, annually hereafter, by the repeal of the excess-profits tax, why can not the Republicans now be equally as generous to the brave boys who made sacrifices, who braved the dangers of the sea and the trenches, and who took the risks of life for their country and their flag, and rescind the repeal and make these big incomes and excess profits of the millionaire profiteers, corporate and individual, who, without making a sacrifice, without enduring a hardship, without incurring a risk, remained at home in peace and safety and collected out of the people and the Government billions of blood money, pay whatever sort of bonus Congress may pass. They were filling their coffers here while the boys were spilling their blood there, and are still and will continue to prey upon and plunder the people.

Be it remembered that our brave boys were making these sacrifices, enduring these hardships, and taking these risks and shedding their blood in defense and for the protection of these same millionaires and corporations—these same fabulous blood-money profits—as well as for their Government and for their country.

The Republican administration favors paying the bonus out of taxes levied upon a general sales tax; that is, levying a tax upon the necessity to buy in order to sustain life. It wishes to put the taxes as much as possible upon the people—the soldiers themselves, and relieve the millionaire profiteers, corporate and individuals. It desires to make all the people, the poor as well as the rich, World War veteran as well as the rest of the people, pay this tax; that is, it desires the poor veteran, with no property and no income, to pay as much toward the bonus, or adjusted compensation, as John D. Rockefeller, with his billion of wealth and millions of yearly income.

President Harding and Secretary Mellon boldly offer a bribe to the World War veterans to espouse the cause of the money power in their efforts to establish as a part of our revenue system the vicious policy of a general sales tax. They offer a bonus in consideration of the veteran and his friends favoring a sales tax. They vigorously fight a bonus without a sales tax, in the hope that the brave boys will be tempted to yield and be willing to help the President and Mr. Mellon and the money power to drive the first effective wedge under the established policy of the income tax, founded upon the principle of ability to pay, and finally to force from our statute books the revenue policy of the entire income tax—a policy which the people established in our tax system after a quarter of a century of hard and persistent struggle with the money power and the Republican leaders.

We undertake to say that the World War veteran even for the bonus or adjusted compensation offered by the Republican President and his Secretary of the Treasury is unwilling to surrender to the money power of the United States the fruits of the people's struggle and victory, and in its stead establish, which the President and Mr. Mellon heartily desire, the vicious principle of taxing the necessity of all the people to buy, proclaiming a new doctrine for the United States—equal burdens by all, rich and poor alike—no relief to any, except the millionaires and monopolistic corporate interests. We are unalterably opposed to this Harding-Mellon money-power scheme.

Treat "the boys" white, gentlemen of the Republican Congress. If you really favor the money bonus, pay them, like men, in cash in full, and not send them out of the Capitol with only scraps of paper as tramping mendicants at the mercy of the banks in our towns and cities. During the war he treated you and your country "white." He now deserves fair, manly treatement at your hands.

The Republicans ask, How can we get the cash now to pay? We answer: Exactly as we have been getting the cash to run the Government for the last five years. Exactly as the Republicans got the cash to pay $3,000,000,000 to the war contractors, two billions to give and loan to the railroads for the benefit of the holders of railroad securities, fifty million for the war-minerals contractors, millions to feed Europe, and exactly as they propose to raise millions for the purpose of paying a ship subsidy.

Levy the taxes as we suggest and issue certificates of indebtedness in anticipation of collection of taxes, to be redeemed when the taxes are paid, as is now provided by law.

When his country called he offered life and limb. What do you now offer him—"a gold brick"!

I then desire to point out that the majority of the Congress of the United States not only felt it was more important to reduce the rich man's taxes in 1921 than it was to pay the soldiers' compensation, but that in 1924 the Congress again reduced the income taxes very largely; then again in 1926 they reduced these same income taxes; then in 1928 they again reduced the income taxes. In December, 1929, after the great stock debacle in New York, during the tremendous panic which resulted, and in the very first of the terrible depression, the Congress again reduced the income taxes and compelled the national deficit with which we have struggled ever since. Moreover, in each one of these five successive income-tax reductions the Congress and administration were not satisfied that the reduction of tax rates should apply for the next year but every time actually remitted a full year's tax already due the people from the corporations and rich men and women of America. These reductions contributed largely toward finally cutting the income of the Government from more than $6,000,000,000 per year to less than $2,000,000,000 a year.

During this entire period the men who had served their country, made this very wealth safe, and which had been created under their protection, were waiting outside holding a rain check due 27 years after the war ended.

It is the great tragedy of the war that the men who made billions from the war were permitted to deny the pittance which their controlled representatives had finally admitted being due to the soldiers who fought the war. It is, therefore, clear that the certificates held by the men did not constitute the contract at all and have nothing to do with the agreement made by those men. It is perfectly clear also that they never accepted willingly any such an arrangement and they have a perfect right to call for the balance of their pay now. They have had that right ever since the war ended.

The suggestion to discount these bills now is thoughtless and cruel on its face. Instead of discounting we ought to compound the interest from the day the war ended to the present minute and pay it gladly and willingly to the men who earned it.

Anyone who doubts that I am here expressing the feeling of the American people was not permitted to see the parade of these 10,000 veterans now in Washington and to hear the cheers of the people who lined the sidewalks along Pennsylvania Avenue. Every man and woman in America would have joined in these cheers had they seen that great procession.

Second. The pretense that we can not pay now is not only untrue but should not be accepted by any man who has the interest of the Government at heart. The plan proposed in this bill known as the Owen plan is, as every economist knows, entirely feasible, entirely practicable, entirely sound, and will in no wise affect our financial system adversely, but on the contrary, if we are wise enough to follow this plan and pay these men it will do at least two things.

First, it will pay an obligation long past due. It will fulfill a contract that we made in 1917. It will not only do that, but it will put into every community a large amount of new money. The very thing which this country is suffering from at the present moment more than any other one thing is the lack of actual cash in hand. Everybody knows that. It is the intention and was originally written into the bill that the bonds provided for in the bill should be held without interest until such time as the price level of 1926 shall have been reestablished. The matter is only left in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board because there was some question as to the legality of this special provision. There is no such question now existing in the form of the bill which is evidently to pass this House.

The idea of the Government using its own money both for itself and for its political subdivisions without interest for carrying on its own work may be new, is new, but that we shall logically and rationally arrive at such an arrangement for all our public improvements is bound to take place. And to those who desire to understand the operation of such an arrangement I call attention to my own House bill No. 12282.

We are going to do a lot of new things before we get out of and away from our present terrible plight. There is no use of gagging at a gnat and swallowing a camel. We may just as well observe that we are going to do these things and figure out how to do them rationally, then proceed to do them. And one of the steps we must take is to pay what has become known as the soldiers' bonus, though it is no bonus at all but a just debt.

Third. Contention that we will unbalance the Budget shows a total lack of understanding of what a budget is. This Congress has not only balanced the Budget but, as one of our leaders says, "We have balanced it with a vengeance." We have gone into this matter carefully. A budget for the Nation is like any other budget. It only includes running expenses, operating costs. A family budget includes rent, food, clothing, fuel, lights, education for children, entertainment for the family; but if the family decides to buy a farm that would not be a part of the budgetary expenses at all. That goes properly into capital investment.

And when we are talking about budgets and budget balancing, without understanding this simple truism, we are bound to mix the entire matter in relation to our National Budget. In short, a properly constituted Budget for the Nation includes only the operating expenses.

I have taken all the appropriations of the present Congress and worked out with some care the table which I here insert:

Total amount appropriated, first session Seventy-second Congress, including amounts for the fiscal year 1933 and supplemental and deficiency amounts for the fiscal year 1932 and prior years[1]	$4,159,119,823.56
Permanent annual appropriations, fiscal year 1933, which require no action by Congress, and which include $1,136,803,478 for sinking fund and interest on the public debt (estimated)[2]	1,285,907,728.00
Total, including postal appropriations	5,445,027,551.56
Total approximate amount of appropriations for permanent improvements and for loans and investments	1,350,815,828.32
Net amount of appropriations, less permanent improvements and loans and investments	4,094,211,723.24
Of this latter sum, the amount for the fiscal year 1933, including postal appropriations, is approximately	4,000,000,000.00
Deduct that part of estimated postal appropriations which is chargeable to postal revenue	600,000,000.00

As will be observed, the actual budgetary expense is only $3,400,000,000, with more than another $200,000,000 to come off, and the estimated income of the Government for that same period is $3,258,500,000 (income estimated from the Treasury Department), and the Government apparently has learned finally to estimate low enough instead of high enough.

To those who are interested in knowing that the credit of this Nation has never at any time been affected by national deficits, I call attention to the official statement contained in my address on the floor of this House on March 17, of this year, in which it is shown that there have been 28 annual deficits since 1858. Ten of them on account of war years and 18 of them in peace years.

The deficit which the Congress and the administration brought on in this country by the unwise lowering of income taxes during the last 10-year period will not affect the credit of the United States Government except with those who may profit by such claptrap. It is to the credit of the United States to pay its debts. It has always done that by issuing bonds and then paying the bonds, and that is exactly what we are compelled to do now.

Why do we not awake to the fact that the appropriation of a half billion dollars out of the Treasury, and the granting of additional credit of one and a half billion to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is nothing more nor less than a Government obligation, and amounts to exactly the same thing as to bonding the Government whether we call it one thing or another; and how any man could have voted for that actual bond issue by the Government for the sake of saving big business and then deny the veterans of the country at least a like consideration is beyond my comprehension.

Fourth. The objection that we can not pay the veterans and give employment both, I confess, strikes a sympathetic chord with me. But we ought to open our eyes to the fact that we not only can do both but that we are going to be compelled to do both, and that the sooner we do both the more certainly we are going to get out of our present great misfortune.

This Congress ought not to adjourn until it provides a far-flung public-works program, because if we put enough new money in circulation, both to pay our debts to the veterans and to put to work a million men, the rest of the 8,000,000 idle will automatically go to work, and we will thereby be enabled to restore our national income. Let us remember that in 1928 and 1929 our national income was $90,000,000,000 a year; that for the year 1932 it will not exceed half that amount. We can not go on half rations for the whole Nation.

We must restore this income, and all we need to do is put men to work. The minute we put men to work our national income will reach and exceed $90,000,000,000 a year, or $300,000,000 for every working-day. With such an income as that our present tax will not only balance the Budget but produce the sort of surplus that we ought to arrange for and keep constantly available to prevent just such conditions as we are now laboring under.

In closing permit me to call the attention of this body to the fact that the Treasury has remitted taxes actually paid in, given back nearly a full $3,000,000,000, much more than is necessary to pay the soldiers' bonus. This has gone to such an extent as to become a national disgrace. It is a challenge to every thoughtful man and woman in America, and I submit these reasons, these observations, these facts, in proof of the contentions I have made in this address.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I was not present at the last roll call. If I had been present, I would have voted "no."

FEDERAL HOME-LOAN BANKS

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 12280, the Federal home-loan bank bill, with Mr. CELLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, at the time the House adjourned on Saturday there was a call for tellers on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] be given five minutes to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 4, section 4, line 10, strike out the words "insurance company."

Page 4, lines 10, 11, and 12, strike out the words "trust company, State bank, or other banking organization except a national bank" and insert the word "and" after "savings bank."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the meaning of this amendment is simply this: We are creating a system of home-loan banks for the purpose of financing home-loan associations, which are building associations. As the bill was originally prepared and introduced, banks did not appear in it. There has been inserted in it banks, State and otherwise, and national banks were taken out of it. Our proposition is to take the insurance companies, the trust companies, and banks out of it entirely. We do that for the reason that they are abundantly provided for and being served by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in the second place they have no business making long-term loans.

Banks that are for deposits of the people's money payable on demand have no business to take five and eight year real-estate loans, so that they can not respond to the demand of the depositors.

In addition, they have more power and are closer to the throne. When it comes to the matter of the loan of this $125,000,000 that we are providing here to be loaned, it will all be absorbed by them. All the frozen real-estate loans in banks and trust companies would be unloaded on this institution.

Not only that, but the borrower who has to become a stockholder would put his funds in the investment, which they are not allowed by sound banking laws to invest in.

For all these reasons, I move to strike these institutions out of the bill.

I may say that I made that motion in committee, but by a divided vote of 8 and 8 the motion was lost.

The plea was made that the little banks should come in. You take a little bank of $50,000 or $25,000, and it can not take less than $1,500 of stock, and it has got to have $150,000 real-estate loans in order to take that $1,500 worth of stock. If it does not do that, it has to put up stock. When it takes loans to that extent a $25,000 or $50,000 bank with $150,000 real-estate loans is a busted bank sooner or later.

Our whole program has been to put these banks in a position where they will not be managed to the detriment of depositors and the destruction of business.

My amendment is to take them out and leave the resources and power to loan money to people who want to own their homes and extend their loans for eight years, as provided for in the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the gentleman's amendment savings banks are restricted?

Mr. STEVENSON. No. I am leaving savings banks in, because they do have a right to make long investments.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman refers to building and loan associations and savings banks. Is there any other?

Mr. STEVENSON. All associations that are making home loans, strictly so called. There are certain kinds of institutions not called building and loan associations that will come within the terms of this act, and all of those which are financing home owners on long and easy terms are embraced within the terms of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for a moment to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Do I understand that trust companies that do strictly savings-bank business would be included within this bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. Savings banks are left in. If a trust company is not a trust company but is a savings bank and can qualify, it will be in. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Is it not true that the Senate Finance Committee has just voted this bill out with all banks in it, including national banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and national banks have no business to make loans of this kind.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, last Saturday, explaining that this is the most important amendment that will have been proposed to this bill, I tried to present fairly the arguments for and against this proposal. After we get by this amendment I think we can proceed very rapidly. I explained on Saturday that I am in hearty sympathy with the objection raised that commercial banks should not be invited to extend further loans on mortgages, and that in my judgment the two systems ought to be kept separate, the commercial loan system and the investment system.

On the other hand, the bill was originally designed to provide a system for home financing and to help all institutions that are engaged in lending money on mortgages. The proposal now is that it be restricted to building and loan associations and savings banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Unless the amendment now pending is adopted, however, we will have a bill which provides that State banks may have access to the loaning facilities of the home-discount banks and national banks will not be permitted to have access to these loaning facilities.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING] suggested a moment ago that in another branch the committee has taken a different view of it and put the national banks back in the list of possible members.

Mr. STEAGALL. If we adopt this bill without this amendment we will have excluded the national banks from participation in the benefits of this legislation and have admitted State banks.

Mr. LUCE. Yes; and I objected to that exclusion in the committee and I object to it now, for this reason: There are in the national banks, or were on the 30th of June, in round numbers, 15,000,000 savings pass-book accounts. There were in the State banks 13,000,000, in round numbers, and in loan and trust companies 7,000,000, so that if this amendment should be adopted it will deprive 20,000,000 savings depositors in our State banks and loan and trust companies of the indirect benefits that would be secured if their institutions could rediscount mortgages.

The significance of the following figures, taken from the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1931, should be appreciated:

Savings pass-book accounts, June 30, 1931

National banks	15,245,028
State (commercial) banks	13,329,564
Loan and trust companies	7,008,907
		35,583,907
Stock savings banks	1,918,578
Mutual savings banks	12,338,256
		14,256,734
		49,840,233
Building and loan association members (1930)		12,350,928
		62,191,161

The number of persons who have two or more pass books or who are members of more than one building and loan association is, of course, conjectural, but it is probably safe to say that the savings depositors in State banks and loan and trust companies who by this amendment will be prohibited the benefits of the indirect enjoyment of the proposed home-loan system number more than 15,000,000, and that if they are not excluded and national banks are put back the total thus helped will be not far from 30,000,000, and certainly more in number than the depositors in savings banks and the members of building and loan associations combined.

The question then is whether for the sake of a principle, with no possibility of immediate effect, because it will be a long time before we succeed in making the cleavage between commercial banks and investment banking, by supporting this amendment you will deprive more than 15,000,000 thrifty, prudent, foresighted citizens of the United States of the benefits that may come to the institutions in which they have their deposits. If I should elaborate this over and over again, I could go no farther. I repeat for the sake of emphasis, you will vote now whether to deprive by this amendment 15,000,000 savers of the indirect benefits of this bill.

It is not probable that the system would be much, if any, used by the big banks or by the great life-insurance companies. It would be particularly suited to the needs of some of the smaller insurance companies and many of the country banks, State or national. Let it be borne in mind that there are thousands of small communities where the local bank is the only resource of the farmer or shopkeeper who has need to borrow, and that many homes would not be built in village or country if mortgages could not be placed in such a bank. If the proposed system is to help the small home owner everywhere, it should take in the banks everywhere.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In my State, and I think in the gentleman's State, savings banks are separate and distinct institutions, not operated for profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned, as I understood it, tellers had been ordered upon this amendment, and the only departure from that status which existed at that time is the unanimous-consent agreement by which we have had 10 minutes of debate for explaining the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD shows that when the committee last rose no tellers had been ordered prior to its rising.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then I am in error. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. LUCE to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 79 and noes 66.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: Page 5, line 5, after the word "act" strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following words: "which are declared to be primarily to furnish loans to and to assist individual home owners."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not anticipate I will take all the time that is allotted to me, but I want to make a brief explanation of the purpose of this amendment.

This law is framed upon the same principle as the Federal reserve system, and it creates a number of regional banks to engage in financing other financial institutions for the purpose of aiding home owners. Every question that I have asked during the discussion of this measure has been with a view to try to get something into this bill that will recognize definitely the purpose of the act.

This committee is to be congratulated, and there is no criticism to be offered of them in any respect whatever in their efforts to bring in a good bill. I think it is a good bill as far as it goes. However, in section 4, beginning on page 4, line 23, they leave open the question of determining the character of institution through which the money is to be advanced and leave the question of determining the purpose of this act to a board. I do not think it is sound legislation to leave to the determination of any board the function or province of determining the purpose of Congress. It is my judgment that the act ought to be made so definite and certain that there can be no question as to what is the intent of the legislative branch of the Government in the enactment of the bill.

Adding these words, it reads: "The character of its management or its home-financing policy is consistent with sound and economical financing, or with the purposes of this act." Of course, it is all right to have a board determine whether or not any association to which it advances money is a sound institution, and it is all right to have them determine whether or not this particular institution is one engaged chiefly, if not exclusively, in the business of loaning money to people who have mortgages on their homes. The words I propose to add simply clarify and explain the purpose of the act. The words added are these: "Which are declared to be primarily to loan money to and give financial aid to home owners."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not a strict construction of the gentleman's amendment exclude a great number of large savings banks, whose very purpose is to conserve the savings of persons who do not know how to invest their funds, but loan their money out on large and small mortgages?

Mr. MAY. The purpose of this amendment does not affect at all the right of the board to determine the character of the institution; but this amendment which I have offered is intended to and does clarify and make definite and certain the purposes of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Philadelphia Savings Fund, founded in 1809, one of the largest savings societies in the country, loans its money so as to get a proper return on office buildings, and yet it may loan money on home mortgages; yet a strict construction of the gentleman's amendment would ban the privileges of this bill to the Philadelphia Savings Fund.

Mr. MAY. It may, if the board created under this act should determine it was safe to loan to that institution, or that the character and management of the institution were such that it was engaged in home financing, or that it was not inconsistent with sound, economical home financing, or with the purposes of this act. The only effect of my amendment is to determine by legislative provision, by placing the words in the act, what the meaning of this act is and not leave it to this board. The courts put in one-third of their time construing statutes that are not intelligently written and which do not express the purpose. The words contained in my amendment merely are added in order to clarify it. We have had to pass two acts—Glass-Steagall bill and the Goldsborough bill—this session to instruct the Federal Reserve Board as to its duty, and that is the very thing Congress will be doing five years from now as to this bill unless you put definite provision here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman would confuse rather than clarify. I imagine it has been put in without acquaintance with the nature of the mutual savings banks and their operations. It would be difficult to say that a mutual savings bank is conducted primarily for the purpose of home financing. The primary purpose is to receive the deposits of thrifty citizens and to invest those deposits. To be sure, the investment is often in mortgages, but the question would immediately be raised whether it is primarily in existence for the purpose of financing homes; and certainly that could not be said of any savings bank. The amendment would arouse so much controversy and, to my mind, would be so entirely superfluous that I hope the gentleman will not press the amendment.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does not the amendment which was just adopted, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, already eliminate savings banks that are engaged in that business?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, no. They are still in the bill. I trust the gentleman will not press the amendment.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall insist on a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It looks to me as though the real proposition is standing on the wrong foot. Section 4 contains two sentences. The first sentence states what institutions are entitled to the benefits of this act, and the second sentence states what institutions are not entitled to the benefits of this act. The gentleman offers his amendment with reference to the institutions that are not entitled to the act. I call attention to the specific language of the first sentence.

Any building and loan association, savings and loan association, etc.—

And then it goes on and states—

That they may have the benefits of this act.

Then down in line 24 it reads:

No institution shall be eligible to become a member of, or a nonmember borrower of, a Federal home-loan bank if, in the judgment of the board, its financial condition is such that advances may not safely be made to such institution or the character of its management or its home-financing policy is inconsistent with sound and economical home-financing, or with the purposes of this act.

The amendment then goes ahead and specifies something which would naturally be definitive, and if it means anything it is definitive of the institutions that are entitled to the benefits of the law.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is there anything in section 4 as written in the bill and amended by the Stevenson amendment that provides that any man who has a mortgage on his home can get a dollar out of these banks?

Mr. BARTON. Not in so many words, but I think it does by implication. If it did not provide for anything of the kind, the gentleman's limitation is a limitation on those who are not entitled to the benefits of the act, not to those who are entitled to its benefits.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BARTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it not a fact that we have had to pass two different acts this session of Congress—the Steagall bill and the Goldsborough bill—to undertake to determine the provisions and proper administration of the Federal reserve act based on this very system?

Mr. BARTON. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Can the gentleman explain how an amendment to the negative part of this section can affect the positive part?

Mr. MAY. This is a definition of the purposes of the act, which is to provide the institutions primarily engaged in the business of extending loans to home owners, the very purpose which has been argued for here all the time.

Mr. BARTON. If the gentleman takes the literal meaning of the language he inserts in the bill, it is a limitation of the exclusions rather than an extension.

Mr. MAY. I did not think the gentleman knew what it was. It is merely a definition of the purposes of the act.

Mr. BARTON. It is not prepared as a separate sentence, but is hooked on to the part that states who shall not have the benefits of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, in striking out just now we failed properly to adjust the language. The word "or" should appear before the words "savings bank," in line 10.

I ask unanimous consent that the word "and" be changed to "or."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On what page is that language?

Mr. STEVENSON. Page 4, line 10, before the words "savings bank."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is not very material, but we ought to make the section harmonious. The language of lines 19, 20, and 21, "trust company, State bank, or other banking organization, except a national bank," should be stricken out. Therefore, I move that this language be stricken out in conformity with the amendment already agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: After line 5, on page 6, add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 5. No institution shall be admitted to or retained in membership or granted the privileges of nonmember borrowers if the combined total of amounts paid to it for interest, commission, bonus, discount, premium, and other similar charges, less a proper deduction for all dividends, refunds, and cash credits of all kinds, creates an actual net cost to the home owner in excess of the maximum legal rate of interest (regardless of any exemption from usury laws) in the State where such property is located."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is the only amendment I shall suggest to this bill. I know the sponsors of the bill are earnest and sincere in their efforts to protect the home owner. My amendment will provide some sort of protection against usury; that is all. Surely there can be no sound objection to declare the intent of Congress as against exorbitant and usurious interest. In my State the trouble that the home owners have had is that they have been bled to death by usurious charges in the form of bonuses, commissions, fees, or renewal charges amounting to as much as 20 or 25 per cent, so as to bring the interest way above the legal rate. This bill provides money, ready cash, and the backing of the United States Government—for a home-loan banking system, for protection of home owners. My amendment simply prevents loan sharks from taking advantage of Government aid to bleed individual borrowers.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Do any institutions eligible for membership under this bill charge as high as 25 per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; in the shape of bonuses, commissions, and fees. That is just our trouble. I want to make it clear that by our silence Congress does not sanction that practice, and that any institution that will charge interest above the lawful rate will not be able to obtain the benefits provided in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, whenever we open the channels for these institutions to come in and rediscount these mortgage loans we are doing it on behalf of the home owner. We want to protect the family in the home and not the loan shark owning the mortgage, and the way to do it is to write into the law that blood money shall not be taken from the American home owner. I say that any person or institution charging a bonus of 20 per cent is a hog and not a business man. I am certain that it is not the intent of Congress to create Federal home-loan banks to aid, assist, and benefit usurers and loan sharks. The bill has only one purpose—there can be no other—and that is protection of the little home owner; protection for the home owner against usurious interest, by whatever name it may be called—bonuses, fees, commissions, charges, or what not. The amendment protects the home owner to that extent. Why should an honest financial institution getting the benefits of Government aid object to being limited to the legal rate of interest? Surely the committee can not refuse to write into the bill, in expressed and clear language, prohibition against usurious interest.

Gentlemen, I do not see how you can possibly resist this amendment. It provides that these institutions shall not charge in interest, or whatever they call it, a rate which will result in the home owner paying more than the legal rate of interest in the particular State where the property is located.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I can assure the gentleman that the committee is in full sympathy with this principle, and the committee endeavored to leave it to the discretion of the board.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do not do that. We are still amending the Federal reserve act because we left too much to their discretion. This is supposed to be a beneficial act for the home owner. Let us make it that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to say that I am in absolute sympathy with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad to hear that, and I trust other members of the committee will agree with the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. OVERTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. Does the gentleman provide for the legal rate of interest or the conventional rate of interest?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The legal rate of interest in the State where the property is located.

Mr. OVERTON. There is a distinction between the legal rate and the conventional rate. In Louisiana the legal rate is 5 per cent, while the conventional rate allowed by law is 8 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would be the legal rate in your State. The amendment reads:

> In excess of the maximum legal rate of interest in the State where such property is located.

So I believe it would be the rate in your State fixed or authorized by law. By that I mean the rate fixed by law, or the rate permitted by law, as the case may be.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman's proposition is all right, but there is a difference in most States between the legal rate and the contract rate allowed by law. For instance, in South Carolina the legal rate is 7 per cent. If judgment is obtained and there is no rate specified, 7 per cent applies; but by contract the rate can be 8 per cent. Does the gentleman mean to make it the legal rate?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it would cover the contract rate, because the amendment provides for the maximum legal rate of interest in the State where such property is located. If the law permits a certain rate by express stipulation of the parties, then that rate would be the legal rate within the meaning of my amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. That would unquestionably cover whatever rate of interest they could charge under the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. I trust my amendment will be accepted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We are all in sympathy with the purpose the gentleman seeks to attain, but I fear it might work a hardship through the construction given to the amendment. I have a casual acquaintance with the operation of building and loan associations. They depend for their very existence on the premiums and other charges that are made to members in connection with their loans. If a member of a building and loan association keeps up with his payments, he only pays the legal rate, plus a certain amount for charges, a certain amount for premiums, and the like. I fear that certain building and loan associations will be barred from the privileges of this act if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York is adopted.

I have been informed that in case a person defaults in a building and loan association the legal rate is something like 7 per cent yet in Wisconsin the legal rate is 6 per cent. This amendment might exclude legitimate building and loan associations, which are not seeking to exact usurious rates, from the benefit of the provisions of this bill. The gentleman does not intend to do that, yet that might be done by hurriedly and haphazardly adopting this amendment without knowing its full scope.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would not the gentleman approve of any system that would prevent the payment of anything above the legal rate of interest?

Mr. STAFFORD. The legal rate in Wisconsin is 6 per cent, yet the building and loan associations in their operation of that system, where a member defaults, the charge is 7 per cent or thereabouts. Does the gentleman intend to bar building and loan associations of my city, carried on in a legitimate way and acknowledged legitimate by the banking commissioner and as safe and sound as State and National banks? I do not think the gentleman intends to do that yet he is presenting a proposal here that will outrage proper building and loan associations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am seeking to protect the home owner.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking to protect the home owners in Milwaukee and yet to permit building and loan associations to operate in a legitimate manner.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am seeking to prevent the charging of usurious rates of interest.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the pending section close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the pending section close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we are creating here an institution by and of Government. The Government is giving it a franchise to have special rights. We should not legalize the admission of any institution in the United States doing a mortgage business and permit them to have access to these funds where they charge an excessive rate of interest. I do not believe that any home owner in the United States should pay 8 per cent for money through a Government-created agency. The money obtained through this agency we are here creating is going to be gotten by these borrowing institutions at a low rate. I am certainly in favor of the amendment which is offered by the gentleman from New York. We all know that a great many of the agencies which are going to be given the privilege of doing business with this home-loan discount bank are now charging excessive rates, and I, for one, am not willing to create an agency here that will permit these institutions to fleece home owners.

One of the great problems we have in the country to-day is this variation of rates, the right to make contracts for higher rates. I certainly would be opposed to the recognition of the right to make contract rates the legal rates in the case of home owners who are pressed for money to save their homes or to build new homes. We are supposed to help home owners, not authorize these loaning agencies to rob them. I hope the amendment is adopted.

We must take into consideration that we are creating an institution here which is to aid and assist in lower rates of interest, and I think we are going a long way if we legalize these institutions to ask usurious rates. This ought to be prohibited.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the gentleman think it would be fair, if this bill became a law, to permit one rate of interest to exist in one State and a different rate of interest in another State? Should not the rates be uniform all over the country?

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to see such a uniform system throughout the country. I know great inequality does exist and great hardships follow, and when we are passing out Federal funds here, of course, the rates should be the same in all States or sections of the country.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry just made of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, let me say that Congress can not fix interest rates to be charged in the different States of the Union. Congress can require institutions set up by national legislation to respect and obey the laws of the respective States in which they operate. We require, by Federal statute, that a national bank shall not be permitted to charge a rate of interest in excess of the rate fixed by the law of the State in which the bank does business. So, as to home-loan banks, the creation of which we attempt to provide in this bill, it would be unthinkable that the Congress by affirmative vote should say that we authorize and expect these home-loan banking institutions to violate directly or indirectly the usury laws of the different States in which these banks are to be established and in which they are to conduct their business.

As was so well stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the purpose of this legislation—the justification for this legislation, if it can be justified—is that it undertakes to aid in home ownership, to grant relief to citizens of the country who in this unfortunate period in which we are suffering find themselves in danger of losing their homes. The purpose of the legislation is to lower interest rates and to conserve and to promote independent home ownership. In order to do this we authorize the issuance of tax-free securities by the home-loan discount banks. This bill provides that the securities put out by these home-loan banks shall be tax free. Are we going to say that the investors, the bondholders who invest their money in the securities of these home-loan banks, shall be exempt from all taxes, and then by specific vote of the Congress authorize and invite these banks to violate the usury laws of the different States in which they conduct their business by charging a rate of interest in excess of the rate fixed by law?

I am sure this House does not want to do that. Let me say that so far as I can I am trying to go along with this legislation. I have aided in getting it reported out of the committee, and I have voted with the friends of the bill at vital points, and I expect to cast my vote for the passage of the bill, but I reserved in the committee my right of free action in the House because I favor the amendments that have been adopted as I favor the one now before us.

I had in mind the very suggestion involved in the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], which I think is wholesome and which ought not to be rejected. It should not be objected to by any Member of this House.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Does the gentleman want this House to understand that there is anything in this bill authorizing or permitting any member of the proposed organization to violate any State law?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; not specifically, but if we vote down an amendment such as offered here now, the record will show that we voted against protecting the home owners of this country in so far as the usury laws of the State are concerned, in the operation of these banks. I hope the committee will not do that. Our experience shows that the wise course for us who want to protect the public interest is to write all necessary safeguards in measures upon which we act, instead of trusting boards and bureaus.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. (a) As soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, the board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall determine the minimum capital of each Federal home-loan bank which shall be not less than $5,000,000. The board shall, as soon as practicable thereafter, open books in each district established under section 3 for subscription to the capital stock of the Federal home-loan bank of the district.

(b) The capital stock of each Federal home-loan bank shall be divided into shares of a par value of $100 each. The minimum capital stock shall be issued at par. Stock issued thereafter shall be issued at such price not less than par as may be fixed by the board.

(c) The original stock subscription for each institution eligible to become a member under section 4 shall be an amount equal to 1 per cent of the aggregate of the unpaid principal of the subscriber's home-mortgage loans, but not less than $1,500. The board shall from time to time adjust the amount of stock held by each member so that, as nearly as possible, such member shall at all times have invested in the stock of the Federal home-loan bank at least an amount calculated in the manner provided in the preceding sentence (but not less than $1,500). If the board finds that the investment of any member in stock is greater than that required under this section, upon application of such member, the bank shall pay such member for each share of stock in excess of the amount so required an amount equal to the value of such stock, or, at the election of the bank, the whole or any part of the payments which would be so made shall be credited upon the indebtedness of the member to the bank. In either such event, stock equal in value to the amount of the payment or credit, or both, as the case may be, shall be surrendered and canceled. No share of stock shall be surrendered and canceled if the effect of such surrender and cancellation would be to violate the provisions of section 9 (c) requiring the amount of stock held by such member to equal at least one-twelfth of the outstanding advances to such member.

(d) Stock subscriptions other than by the United States shall be paid for in cash, and shall be paid for at the time of application therefor, or, at the election of the subscriber, in installments, but not less than one-fourth of the total amount payable shall be paid at the time of filing application, and a further sum of not less than one-fourth of such total shall have been paid at the end of each succeeding period of four months.

(e) If the law of the State under which an institution described in section 4 operates does not permit such institution to subscribe for stock in the Federal home-loan bank, but if such institution has the power to borrow money and give security therefor, the board may permit such institution to obtain advances on the same terms and conditions and subject to the same limitations as members (except that such institution shall not be required, during the period during which advances may be made under this subsection, to subscribe for stock in the Federal home-loan bank or to deposit such stock as collateral security as required in section 9), but such institution shall be required to keep on deposit such security, in addition to home mortgages, for such advances, as the board shall determine, which shall equal in value 1 per cent of the aggregate unpaid principal of such institution's home-mortgage loans (but not less than $1,500). No advance to any such institution shall be made under authority of this subsection after the State in which the institution is organized enacts legislation authorizing such institution to subscribe for Federal home-loan bank stock or after the expiration of the next regular session of the legislature of such State begun after the enactment of this act, whichever is earlier. If, at the end of such time, such institution is not authorized to subscribe for stock, the bank shall proceed to liquidate the indebtedness of such institution to the bank and to terminate its relations with such institution. No advance shall be made under authority of this subsection which matures more than one year after the advance is made, but the bank may renew any such advance for yearly periods, or less, thereafter. The maturity of no advance authorized under this subsection shall be later than the time of the enactment of legislation authorizing such institution to become a member or the expiration of such session of the legislature of the State, whichever is earlier.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury shall subscribe, on behalf of the United States, for such part of the minimum capital of each Federal home-loan bank as is not subscribed for by members under subsection (c) of this section within 30 days after books have been opened for stock subscriptions as provided in subsection (a). Payments for stock subscriptions by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be subject to call in whole or in part by the board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time or times as may be deemed advisable. Each Federal home-loan bank receiving such payments shall issue receipts therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury, and such receipts shall be evidence of the stock ownership of the United States. The aggregate amount expended by the United States for the purchase of stock under this act shall not exceed $125,000,000. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, approved January 22, 1932, is amended by adding at the end of section 2 thereof the following new paragraph:

"In order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make payments upon stock of Federal home-loan banks subscribed for by him in accordance with the Federal home loan bank act, the sum of $125,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for such purpose, is hereby allocated and made available to the Secretary of the Treasury out of the capital of the corporation and/or the proceeds of notes, debentures, bonds, and other obligations issued by the corporation. For the purposes of this paragraph, the corporation shall issue such notes, bonds, debentures, and other obligations as may be necessary."

(g) After the amount of capital of a Federal home-loan bank paid in by members equals the amount paid in by the Secretary of the Treasury under subsection (f), such bank shall apply annually to the payment and retirement of the shares of the capital stock held by the United States, 50 per cent of all sums thereafter paid in as capital until all such capital stock held by the United States is retired at par. Stock held by the United States may at any time, in the discretion of the Federal home-loan bank, and with the approval of the board, be paid off at par and retired in whole or in part; and the board may at any time require such stock to be paid off at par and retired in whole or in part if in the opinion of the board the Federal home-loan bank has resources available therefor.

(h) Stock subscribed for otherwise than by the United States, and the right to the proceeds thereof, shall not be transferred or hypothecated except as hereinafter provided and the certificates therefor shall so state.

(i) Any member may withdraw from membership in a Federal home-loan bank six months after filing with the board written notice of intention so to do, and the board may, after hearing, remove any member from membership, or deprive any nonmember borrower of the privilege of obtaining further advances, if, in the opinion of the board, such member or nonmember borrower has failed to comply with any provision of this act or the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto or if, in the opinion of the board, such member or nonmember borrower is insolvent. In any such case, the indebtedness of such member or nonmember borrower to the Federal home-loan bank shall be liquidated, and the capital stock in the Federal home-loan bank owned by such member shall be surrendered and canceled. Upon the liquidation of such indebtedness such member or nonmember borrower shall be entitled to the return of its collateral, and, upon surrender and cancellation of such capital stock, the member shall receive a sum equal to its cash paid subscriptions for the capital stock surrendered, except that if at any time the board finds that the paid-in capital of a Federal home-loan bank is or is likely to be impaired as a result of losses in or depreciation of the assets held, the Federal home-loan bank shall on the order of the board withhold from the amount to be paid in retirement of the stock a pro rata share of the amount of such impairment as determined by the board.

(j) A Federal home-loan bank may, with the approval of the board, permit the disposal of stock to another member, or to an institution eligible to become a member, but only to enable such an institution to become a member.

(k) All stock of any Federal home-loan bank shall share in dividend distributions without preference, except that stock subscribed for by the United States shall be entitled to dividends at a rate of 2 per cent per annum cumulative from the date of investment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "value," in line 8, page 7. I do that for the purpose of making an inquiry. I note that in providing for the amount which the Federal home-loan bank is required to pay for stock which may be surrendered to the bank by a member, that he is to receive the value of the stock at the time he surrenders it. Why should he not be entitled to the amount he paid when he got the loan? By the terms of the bill whenever the Government subscribes for stock it pays at par, and when it surrenders it receives the par value. Why should not the borrower be put in the same position as the Government?

Mr. LUCE. The understanding was that the value of the stock might go up or might go down, and that the borrower should have the value at the time he surrenders the stock.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It will not have any market value, and how are you going to determine the value?

Mr. LUCE. If you provide that it shall be surrendered at the par value, he would not get any share of the profits.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. My thought is that a borrower should receive what the stock cost him. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 12, line 17, I move to strike out "share in dividend distributions without preference," and in order to save time I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks and insert some excerpts.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear what was the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to insert some excerpts relating to the remarks I made to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

MANAGEMENT OF BANKS

SEC. 6. (a) The management of each Federal home-loan bank shall be vested in a board of 11 directors, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States and bona fide residents of the district in which such bank is located.

(b) Two of such directors shall be appointed by the board. The terms of such directors shall expire one year and two years, respectively, from the end of the calendar year 1932, and their successors shall be appointed by the board for terms of three years.

(c) Nine of such directors, 3 of whom shall be known as class A directors, 3 of whom shall be known as class B directors, and 3 of whom shall be known as class C directors, shall be first appointed by the board, and shall serve until the end of the calendar year 1932. Their successors shall be elected as provided in subsection (d), and of such successors first elected one of each such class shall serve for one, two, and three years, respectively. Thereafter all such directors shall serve for three years. Directors of classes A, B, and C, whether appointed or elected, shall be chosen from among persons connected with the home-financing business.

(d) The board shall divide all the members of each Federal home-loan bank into three groups which shall be designated as groups A, B, and C, which groups shall represent, respectively, and as fairly as may be, group A, the large, group B, the medium-sized, and group C, the small members, the size of such members to be determined according to the aggregate unpaid principal of the member's home-mortgage loans. The board may revise the membership of such groups from time to time. Of the directors elected as hereinafter provided, each class A director shall be an officer or director of a member in group A, each class B director shall be an officer or director of a member in group B, and each class C director shall be an officer or director of a member in group C. Each member shall be entitled to nominate suitably qualified persons for election as directors of the class corresponding to the group to which such member belongs, and shall cast one vote for each director in its class. The directors of each class shall be nominated and elected in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board.

(e) Any director appointed or elected as provided in this section to fill a vacancy shall hold office only until the expiration of the term of his predecessor.

(f) The board shall designate one of the directors of each bank to be chairman, and one to be vice chairman of the board of directors of such bank.

(g) If at any time when nominations are required, members shall hold less than $1,000,000 of the capital stock of the Federal home-loan bank, the board shall appoint a director or directors to fill the place or places for which such nominations are required. A director so appointed shall serve until the expiration of the calendar year during which he takes office.

(h) Each bank may pay its directors reasonable compensation for the time required of them, and their necessary expenses in the performance of their duties, in accordance with the resolutions adopted by such directors, subject to the approval of the board.

(i) Such board of directors shall administer the affairs of the bank fairly and impartially and without discrimination in favor of or against any member or nonmember borrower, and shall, subject to the provisions hereof, extend to each institution authorized to secure advances such advances as may be made safely and reasonably with due regard for the claims and demands of other institutions, and with due regard to the maintenance of adequate credit standing for the Federal home-loan bank and its obligations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in this section 6, you are providing for a board of directors consisting of nine, to be selected by the members of the corporation, and requiring that they shall be residents of the district in which the bank is located. Under the purposes of this bill certain benefits and privileges are conferred, and I am wondering whether the committee considered the advisability of requiring that at least one member of the board should be from each State comprising the district. I think it would be a very good representation if we should prescribe that one of the nine members should be from each State in the district.

Mr. REILLY. But suppose there were not nine States in the district?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the wording of the drafted amendment, line 24, page 12, I suggest to be inserted "at least one resident of each State comprising said district," so that it will make it mandatory that each State shall be represented on this board.

Mr. REILLY. I do not know of any reason why it could not be left to the board that will pick only competent men.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should not each State have a representative on the board?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Take Maryland, for instance; the State might not be qualified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I think Maryland would be qualified at all times.

Mr. REILLY. I do not think a State should have a representative if it has not a competent man to represent it.

Mr. STAFFORD. My uppermost thought was that if a State is looking for a loan under the provisions of this act, they should have a representative so that they could get their just deserts.

Mr. LUCE. As the bill now stands, National and State banks and insurance companies are taken out, and the measure is restricted to building and loan associations and savings banks. Building and loan associations have progressed much more rapidly in some States than in others. In New Jersey, for example, and in Pennsylvania and Ohio the system is found to be thoroughly developed.

Mr. STAFFORD. And do not leave out Wisconsin.

Mr. LUCE. And Wisconsin, but the greater part of these associations are in comparatively few States. To apply the principle of the United States Senate and say that Delaware should have one director and Pennsylvania one director would not be, to my mind, logical and would serve no useful purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not want to have all of the directors come from a few States, and to have my State excluded absolutely. The gentleman lays emphasis upon the fact that we have virtually limited the benefits of the act to building and loan associations. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that savings banks are included, and nearly every State has savings banks.

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I think the gentleman will find almost no savings banks in half the States of the country. They are mostly in the Northeast and in the Eastern Central part.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where there are no savings banks there are associations similar to building and loan associations which are privileged to have the benefits of the act. I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. REILLY. It is expected that the members of the board of directors ordinarily will give only a part of their time. It might be inconvenient to have a member of the board of directors two or three hundred miles from this bank. I can not see why this matter can not safely be left to the board.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ADVANCES TO MEMBERS

SEC. 9. (a) Each Federal home-loan bank is authorized to make advances to members and nonmember borrowers, upon the security of home mortgages, such advances to be made subject to such regulations, restrictions, and limitations as the board may prescribe. Any such advance shall be subject to the following limitations as to amount:

(1) If secured by a home mortgage given in respect of an amortized home-mortgage loan which was for an original term of eight years or more, or in cases where shares of stock, which are pledged as security for such loan, mature in a period of eight years or more, the advance may be for an amount not in excess of 60 per cent of the unpaid principal of the home-mortgage loan; in no case shall the amount of the advance exceed 40 per cent of the value of the real estate securing the home-mortgage loan.

(2) If secured by a home mortgage given in respect of any other home-mortgage loan, the advance shall not be for an amount in excess of 50 per cent of the unpaid principal of the home-mortgage loan; in no case shall the amount of such advance exceed 30 per cent of the value of the real estate securing the home-mortgage loan.

(b) No home mortgage shall be accepted as collateral security for an advance by a Federal home-loan bank if, at the time such advance is made (1) the home-mortgage loan secured by it has more than 15 years to run to maturity, or (2) the value of the real estate with respect to which the home mortgage is given exceeds $20,000. For the purposes of this subsection and subsection (a) the value of real estate shall be as of the time the advance is made and shall be established by such certification by the borrowing institution, or such other evidence as the board may require. For the purposes of this section, each Federal home-loan bank shall have power to make, or to cause or require to be made, such appraisals and other investigations as it may deem necessary. No home mortgage otherwise eligible to be accepted as collateral security for an advance by a Federal home-loan bank shall be accepted if any director, officer, employee, attorney, or agent of the Federal home-loan bank or of the borrowing institution is personally liable thereon, unless the board has specifically approved such acceptance.

(c) Such advances shall be made upon the note or obligation of the member or nonmember borrower secured as provided in this section, bearing such rate of interest as the board may approve or determine, and the Federal home-loan bank shall have a lien upon and shall hold the stock of such member as further collateral security for all indebtedness of the member to the Federal home-loan bank. At no time shall the aggregate outstanding advances made by any Federal home-loan bank to any member exceed twelve times the amounts paid in by such member for outstanding capital stock held by it, or made to a nonmember borrower exceed twelve times the value of the security required to be deposited under section 5 (e).

(d) The institution applying for an advance shall enter into a primary and unconditional obligation to pay off all advances, together with interest and any unpaid costs and expenses in connection therewith according to the terms under which they were made, in such form as shall meet the requirements of the bank and the approval of the board. The bank shall reserve the right to require at any time, when deemed necessary for its protection, deposits of additional collateral security or substitutions of security by the borrowing institution, and each borrowing institution shall assign additional or substituted security when and as so required. Subject to the approval of the board, any Federal home-loan bank shall have power to sell to any other Federal home-loan bank, with or without recourse, any advance made under the provisions of this act, or to allow to such bank a participation therein, and any other Federal home-loan bank shall have power to purchase such advance or to accept a participation therein, together with an appropriate assignment of security therefor.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the figures "$20,000" in line 6, page 18. The other day we adopted an amendment to include 3-family houses and it seems to me that possibly some of those 3-family houses would not get under this if the gentleman insisted on keeping the figure at $20,000. It seems to me the figure should be raised to $25,000 or possibly $30,000 in order to allow in these 3-family houses.

Mr. REILLY. The committee will accept an amendment to $25,000.

Mr. GOSS. The bill refers to the value of the real estate with respect to which the home mortgage is given, which value exceeds $20,000. When you take the land and building of a 3-family house at $20,000 or $25,000, does not the gentleman think it would be better to raise it to $30,000 in all fairness? I do not want to make it too high, but it seems to me that $30,000 is better than $25,000. Would the gentleman be willing to accept such an amendment?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not think the committee would. For my part I could not.

Mr. GOSS. I understood that the committee would accept $25,000.

Mr. STEAGALL. I think we made a great mistake when we raised the maximum limit on loans in the Federal land bank. I do not mean to say I told you so, but I was opposed to it at the time. I have watched it in its development. I think it was a very unfortunate action on our part. I hope no such step will be taken with reference to this bill.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 18, line 6, strike out "$20,000" and insert "$25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss), there were—ayes 7, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 18, line 6, strike out the period after the figures and insert, "or (3) is past due when presented."

Mr. STEVENSON. That is merely to guard against putting past due paper in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 19, after the word "approved," insert "by formal resolution."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, that amends a provision which allows the banks to buy paper in which some officer of the bank is interested. The bill provides that it must be specifically approved before acceptance. I think it ought to be approved by formal resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL POWERS AND DUTIES OF BANKS

SEC. 10. (a) Each Federal home-loan bank shall have power, subject to the approval of the board, (1) to borrow money, to give security therefor, and to pay interest thereon, and (2) to issue bonds and debentures having such maturities as may be determined by the board, secured by the transfer of eligible obligations of borrowing institutions on advances made by the bank to borrowing institutions and by the deposit of home mortgages.

(b) The board shall prescribe rules and regulations governing the assignment, deposit, custody, substitution, and release of the obligations of borrowing institutions to the bank which are transferred and of the home mortgages securing such bonds and debentures, the forms and terms of such bonds and debentures, and the conditions under which they may be issued and retired, including any option with respect to payment and retirement thereof in advance of maturity, and such regulations shall provide for the deposit in trust, under such terms and conditions as it may deem advisable, of the home mortgages securing such bonds and debentures. For the purposes of this section the board is authorized to appoint, and fix the compensation and prescribe the duties of a registrar in each district, who shall not be connected with or interested in any Federal home-loan bank, any member, any nonmember borrower, or any institution of a class eligible to become a member or a nonmember borrower under this act, and to require of such registrar a bond, in such amount and with such sureties as the board may fix, conditioned on the faithful performance of the duties required of him.

(c) Such deposits in trust shall be so maintained that the aggregate unpaid principle of the home-mortgage loans secured by the home mortgages deposited as security for any issue of bonds or debentures shall, as nearly as possible, be at all times not less than an amount equal to 190 per cent of the total outstanding amount of such issue. Cash deposited under authority of subsection (d) shall be security for an amount of bonds and debentures equal to the amount of cash deposited. Direct obligations of the United States deposited under authority of subsection (d) shall be security for an amount of bonds and debentures equal to the par value of such obligations.

(d) The board may at any time require any Federal home-loan bank to deposit additional home mortgages or to make substitutions of home mortgages to secure such bonds and debentures, except that when in the opinion of the board home mortgages are not available for such purpose, it may permit, for such limited periods as it may deem advisable, the deposit of cash or direct obligations of the United States in lieu of the deposit of substitute or additional home-loan mortgages.

(e) The board shall approve or determine the rates of interest to be paid by the Federal home-loan banks upon the notes, debentures, or bonds which they may issue, except that no bond or debenture issued within seven years after the enactment of this act shall bear a rate of interest in excess of 5½ per cent per annum, and no bond or debenture issued thereafter shall bear a rate of interest in excess of 5 per cent per annum, and shall provide such margins between interest rates received upon advances made to borrowing institutions and interest paid upon obligations which the Federal home-loan bank may issue as will cover expenses of operation and reserves and, under such regulations as may be provided by the board, some part of such reserve may be devoted to retirement of the stock subscribed by the United States.

(f) The Federal home-loan banks shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment when due of all bonds and debentures, and of notes and other obligations issued by any Federal home-loan bank, and interest thereon, in accordance with their terms: Provided, That this shall not prevent any particular Federal home-loan bank, when specifically so authorized by the board, from borrowing funds temporarily under the terms of obligations which shall expressly state in substance in such manner as shall be approved by the board that the liability therefor is confined to the issuing bank. The Federal home-loan banks shall from time to time, in accordance with rules, regulations, and orders of the board, make adequate agreements and arrangements among themselves for meeting the payment of the bonds, debentures, notes, or other obligations on which they are jointly and severally liable, and the interest thereon, but such agreements and arrangements shall not restrict in any respect the joint and several liability herein established.

(g) Each Federal home-loan bank shall have power to accept only such deposits as are made by members and nonmember borrowers of such bank or by other Federal home-loan banks. Such deposits shall not be subject to check, and no rate of interest in excess of 2 per cent per annum shall be paid thereon. "Deposits" as used in this section does not include deposits made under section 5 (e). No Federal home-loan bank shall transact any banking or other business not expressly authorized by this act.

(h) The board is authorized and empowered to permit, or, whenever in the judgment of at least four members of the board an emergency exists requiring such action, to require, Federal home-loan banks to rediscount the discounted notes of members or nonmember borrowers held by other Federal home-loan banks, or to purchase the bonds issued by any other Federal home-loan bank, or to make deposits with other Federal home-loan banks. In any case in which the board requires the purchase of bonds, the board shall fix the price therefor, or if the board requires the acceptance of a deposit it shall fix the security therefor. The rediscount rates and the rates of interest to be paid upon deposits shall be fixed by the board.

(i) Each Federal home-loan bank shall at all times have an amount, equal to the sums paid in on outstanding capital subscriptions of its members, plus an amount, equal to the current deposits received from its members and from nonmember borrowers, invested in (1) obligations of the United States, (2) deposits in banks or trust companies, (3) advances with maturity not greater than one year made to members or nonmember borrowers, upon such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, and (4) advances with maturity not greater than one year made to members or nonmember borrowers the amount of whose creditor liabilities (not including advances from the Federal home-loan bank) does not exceed 5 per cent of such member's or nonmember borrower's net assets, which advances may be made without the security of home mortgages or other security, upon such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe.

(j) Such part of the assets of each Federal home-loan bank (except reserves and except sums provided for in subsection (i)) as such bank may deem available therefor, and as are not required for advances to members or nonmember borrowers, may be invested, subject to such regulations, restrictions, and limitations as may be prescribed by the board, in direct obligations of the United States and in such securities as fiduciary and trust funds may be invested in under the laws of the State in which the Federal home-loan bank is located.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 14, after the word "margins," insert "not to exceed 1½ per cent."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, that amendment undertakes to limit the difference between the amount that the banks shall charge to 1½ per cent. In other words, the difference between what they pay on their debentures and what they charge as a rate of interest to borrowing institutions shall not exceed 1½ per cent. The testimony before the committee was to the effect that the banks should operate reasonably profitably, with a spread of 1 per cent, and this allows them 1½ per cent or not to exceed that amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: On page 25, in line 4, after the word "prescribe," substitute a colon for the period and add "Provided, however, That no such advances under this subsection (4) shall be made without the security of home mortgages after the State in which the institution is organized enacts legislation authorizing such institution to pledge or assign home mortgages or other security for advances, or after the expiration of the next regular session of the legislature of such State beginning after the enactment of this act, whichever is earlier."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely to remove one of the very serious objections I have to the bill, as stated in my minority report. There are certain States where building and loan associations can not pledge their mortgages for loans, and under the provisions here they can borrow if their liabilities do not exceed 5 per cent of the net assets. That was in the bill absolutely permanent, and it looked like it was made for the purpose of allowing some of them to borrow without security. The explanation is that until there is legislation they can not borrow at all, and can not become members unless they can borrow without putting up home-loan mortgages as security. This provision merely allows them to do that until the end of the next legislature after this bill is enacted; and if the legislature does not then give them the right to do it, they are out. It cures, as far as I am concerned, a very serious defect.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. If the court of last resort of the State in which any particular building and loan association is located has already decided that question, why wait for legislation?

Mr. STEVENSON. If they have already decided that question, they do not need to wait for legislation; but where it has not been decided, where they are clearly unable to assign their mortgages as security without legislative authority, then the proposition is to give them the right to borrow without pledging their security, because all of their assets are behind it, anyway. If they do not owe more than 5 per cent of their assets, it would probably be a safe loan; but it is a bad principle and I object to it, and this is language prepared by the people who are promoting this bill and is entirely satisfactory to me if it is satisfactory to the House, because the legislatures will all meet within a year or two and this right to borrow without security will be wiped out, either by failure of the legislature to act or by its affirmative action.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to approve of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina and to call attention to paragraph (h) on page 23. We are reading this bill quite rapidly. I think it is well to understand what this section permits. It permits the discounting in any one district of the mortgages from other districts when approved by four members of the board. It permits the transferring of securities from one district into another, in the concentration of this business. While we have provisions here dividing the country up into districts, there is no assurance that the assets of one district can not all be transferred, for instance, to the New York district.

I think it is well for the House to know that there is that right granted in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. On page 22, subdivision (e), provision is made for the sale of notes, bonds, debentures, and so forth, of the Federal home-loan banks. Is the system, as a system, or all of the banks liable for these notes and debentures, or is only the bank for whom they are sold liable on these bonds and debentures?

Mr. REILLY. The whole system is liable.

Mr. STEVENSON. Jointly and severally?

Mr. REILLY. Just the same as the Federal land bank.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, this bill seeks to create a third system of banks, national in scope, with the avowed purpose of benefiting the home owners of America. A comparison of the three systems will aid in an understanding of the provisions of this bill to establish home-loan banks.

In 1913 the Federal reserve system of banking was established. The act provided for a board of eight members, six of whom were appointed by the President and two ex officio, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. Twelve districts were established, each district having a Federal reserve bank governed by its own board of 9 members, 3 of whom are chosen by and to be representative of the member banks, 3 to be actively engaged in commerce, agriculture, or some other industrial pursuit in the district, and 3 designated by the Federal Reserve Board. The board also has authority to designate one of the members to be chairman of the district bank's board of directors. That official has the title of "Federal reserve agent." His duties are not only those of an officer of the bank but also those of custodian of the collateral which member banks surrender as security for Federal reserve notes.

National banks are required to become members of the Federal reserve system and State banks may become members by qualifying under the regulations. Each member bank must subscribe for stock of the Federal reserve bank in an amount equal to 6 per cent of its capital and surplus. The member banks must maintain in the Federal reserve bank a certain percentage of their time and demand deposits. The business carried on by the Federal reserve banks consists chiefly in the purchase and sale of bankers' acceptances, United States bonds, commercial paper, and all time loans of 90 days or less, excepting agricultural notes, which are permitted to run for 6 months or less. The reserve bank then issues its notes, guaranteed by the Government, to the borrowing bank. When the discounted note matures, the member bank is obliged to take up its paper either by returning the notes of the Federal reserve bank or by substituting paper of equal value.

A Federal reserve bank must be possessed of $40 in gold for every $100 in notes it pays into circulation. The remainder above the $40 is made up of notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances indorsed by member banks. By an amendment recently passed, the Glass-Steagall bill, securities issued by the Federal Government may be substituted for the $40 or 40 per cent gold basis.

The second system of banks, national in scope, is that of the Federal land banks. The Federal farm loan act was passed in 1916 to provide capital for agricultural developments, create a standard form of investment based on farm mortgages, equalize rates of interest on farm loans, and for other purposes. A bureau was established in the Treasury Department known as the Federal Farm Loan Bureau. This bureau is under the supervision of the Federal Farm Loan Board, consisting of six members appointed by the President and, ex officio, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The United States, including Alaska, is divided into 12 Federal land bank districts. In each district there has been established a Federal land bank. Ohio is in the Louisville district. Each bank has authority to establish branches within its district. Each Federal land bank has seven directors and, before beginning business, must have subscribed capital of not less than $750,000.

These banks make loans to farmers through local corporations which are chartered by the Federal Farm Loan Board and which are known as national farm-loan associations. There are about 6,400 of these associations in the United States. In my home county—Allen County, Ohio—the association is known as the Allen County National Farm Loan Association. The stockholders in the association are the borrowers. They elect directors, who in turn select the executive officers and loan committee of three members. A bonded secretary-treasurer appointed by the directors receives applications for loans, keeps the association records, and handles the details of the business.

A person who borrows must subscribe for stock of the association. The association is liable for the obligation of the borrower, indorsing the note over to the district Federal land bank. The bank then issues bonds on the notes of the farmers it purchases from the association, and thus obtains more funds to lend to the farmers. The farm loan act places a limit of $25,000 on the amount that may be loaned to any one person. No loan is made in excess of 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land mortgaged and 20 per cent of the appraised value of permanent, insured improvements. The rate of interest to be paid depends upon conditions in the money market. The initial fee to cover the farm-loan association's cost of administration is limited by the act to 1 per cent of the amount applied for by the borrower.

A similar plan or set-up is found in the bill now under consideration. Federal home-loan banks are to be established in from 8 to 12 districts, to be determined by a board created by the bill when enacted into law. The Federal home-loan board will consist of five members appointed by the President. Building and loan associations, cooperative banks, homestead associations, savings banks, trust companies, and other banks with time deposits (except national banks) and insurance companies, if subject to inspection and regulation under the banking laws or under similar laws of the States or the United States, were to be eligible for membership. The House to-day, however, has voted to deprive banks, trust companies, and insurance companies of the benefits of this bill; the Senate may insist that they be permitted to participate, which should be the case.

There is to be one Federal home-loan bank in each Federal home-loan district. The Federal home-loan board is to determine the minimum capital of each of these district banks, which will be not less than $5,000,000. Each of these Federal home-loan banks is to have 11 directors—2 appointed by the Federal home-loan board, 3 elected by the small-size members, 3 elected by the medium-size members, and 3 by the large-size members. The capital stock of each Federal home-loan bank is to be divided into shares with a par value of $100 per share.

To become a member, a financial institution must subscribe to the capital stock of the district home-loan bank in an amount equal to 1 per cent of the aggregate of the unpaid principal upon its home-mortgage loans, but not less than in the amount of $1,500. Unpaid principal means home-mortgage loans less (1) payments made thereon, and (2) in cases where shares are pledged as security for the loan, the payments made on such shares or stock plus earnings or dividends apportioned or credited thereon. The amount of the capital not subscribed by the members within 30 days after the books have been opened for stock subscriptions less than $5,000,000 is required to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States. Funds for this purpose are to be furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in a sum not to exceed $125,000,000, upon which the Government is to receive not to exceed 2 per cent interest. As subscriptions are received by the home-loan banks, this money advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is to be repaid. The stock held by the United States is to be retired at par, it being intended that the member banks supply the permanent capital.

A member bank may borrow from the Federal home-loan bank by placing mortgages with the bank as security. A larger amount may be borrowed on amortized installment mortgages of a term of eight years or more than is advanced on straight mortgages or mortgages of shorter duration. In no case can the amount advanced by the home-loan bank exceed 40 per cent of the value of the real estate. No mortgage on a home of greater value than $20,000 or occupied by more than three families will be accepted. The home-loan bank can not advance to any member an amount in excess of twelve times the amount of the capital subscribed by the member bank.

The bonds issued by each home-loan bank are to be secured by seasoned real estate home mortgages, with not less than 190 per cent of unpaid mortgage principal behind each $1 of bond issued. The Federal home-loan bank board will determine or approve the rates of interest to be paid by the banks on their bonds or borrowings. A maximum rate of 5½ per cent is established for the first seven years, after which it will be 5 per cent. The banks are to be jointly and severally liable on the bonds, and in order to keep the Federal home-loan banks in proper condition to serve their membership they will be required to have an amount equal to the capital subscription of their members in (1) United States Government securities, (2) deposits in banks or trust companies, and (3) short-term loans to member banks. The bonds issued by the Federal home-loan banks are to be tax exempt.

Mortgages on small homes in the United States amount to $20,000,000,000. Nearly $8,000,000,000 of these are held by building and loan associations, the remainder being held by banks, insurance companies, and private investors.

The people of Ohio are particularly interested in this measure. Mr. James A. Devine, who for many years has served as secretary of the Ohio Building Association League, Columbus, Ohio, testified before the Senate Finance Committee in favor of the bill. He called attention to the fact that there are close to 800 building and loan associations functioning in Ohio. Only five have been liquidated, all of which paid 100 cents on the dollar to depositors. He states that there are great advantages to be gained by the bill:

> If it passes and becomes law and comes speedily into operation, it will relieve conditions by making it possible to obtain funds wherewith to pay withdrawals that are actually needed. If business resumes and we get back to a normal basis, we still will be in the position of having to liquidate all of our available cash, and have a period of reconstruction for homes which must necessarily ensue for the next two or three years, because now since 1929 we have had no building construction—it is at a very low ebb and it will be necessary to raise funds and begin to rebuild.

The Supreme Court of Ohio has recently ruled that building and loan associations are not subject to the appointment of a receiver for the purposes of liquidation at the request of a depositor. (124 Ohio State, 269.) The associations come exclusively within the jurisdiction of the superintendent of building and loan associations of Ohio. The report of the superintendent for the fiscal year ending December 31, 1930, shows that 791 associations filed annual reports, a compilation of which discloses total assets of $1,246,864,413, of which loans on mortgage security constitute $1,108,681,799. These reports also show the total number of stockholders to be 1,815,005; the number of borrowers, 419,846; and the number of depositors, 1,142,017.

Under Ohio laws these associations have placed stop orders into effect, whereby the associations have been saved; but the depositors have not been able to withdraw their funds. We likewise have seen a period wherein there has been very little home construction.

If this bill should become a law, funds would be available for a number of purposes: To refinance existing mortgages so as to permit smaller payments; to tide over or carry along worthy borrowers who, because of unemployment, are having difficulty in meeting interest or installment payments; to assist borrowers in paying taxes and insurance costs; to provide funds for repairing homes, thus increasing employment; and to refinance the large number of short-term mortgages which have been called for payment due to bank failures and due to like financial institutions converting their resources into liquid funds. Thousands of home owners are in distress for mortgage money to-day.

This new banking system, national in scope, should release much-needed money to depositors, stimulate industry, stabilize realty values, and restore confidence.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION

SEC. 12. Any and all notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations issued by any bank shall be exempt both as to principal and interest from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority. The bank, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, and surplus, and its income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority; except that any real property of the bank shall be subject to State, Territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Beginning on page 27, line 3, and ending in line 18, strike out section 12.

Mr. STEVENSON. All I want to say is that I oppose any further extension of tax-free securities. Throughout the controversy over this bill I have maintained that position. I still maintain it, but it is up to the House to determine what it shall do about it.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the position of the gentleman from South Carolina and am not disposed to take the time of the committee to enter thoroughly into the question of exemption from taxes.

I wish the committee to know the reasons why the phraseology is as it is. The first thing we did this session in the matter of the President's program was to lend to the Federal land banks $125,000,000 more for capital and other uses. That system had been established with tax exemptions. Whether it was wise or not, and whether if to-day we were to pass on that question anew we would decide as we decided then, need not here be discussed. The fact is we have established that principle in the help we are giving to the agricultural interests of the country, and to treat the home owners with less liberality is hardly to be defended. As a matter of fact, in the bill itself we have put a stipulation that the securities issued shall not be exempt from inheritance, estate, or gift taxes, or surtaxes, making the language just as it is in the provisions relating to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In view of that, the majority of the committee were of the belief that it would be reasonable and logical to pass the bill in this form even if we did not fully give to the home-loan system securities the same privileges that we gave in the case of the farm-loan system.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I admit, as I stated in my minority report, the committee did concede taxation for inheritance, gift taxes, and surtaxes. This was granted on my solicitation, and therefore I have not been as zealous about this as I otherwise would have been.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this provision in the bill is so vital to its success that I believe those of us who desire the legislation should not endanger the success of the bill by attempting to strike it out.

So far as I am concerned, I hope the provision will remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

SEC. 16. For the purposes of this act there shall be a board to be known as the Federal home-loan bank board, which shall consist of five citizens of the United States appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each member shall devote his entire time to the business of the board. Before entering upon his duties each of the members shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. The President of the United States shall designate one of the members of the board to serve for a term of 2 years, one for 3 years, one for 4 years, one for 5 years, and one for 6 years from the date of the enactment hereof, and thereafter the term of each member shall be 6 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed. Whenever a vacancy shall occur among the members the person appointed to fill such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired portion of the term of the member whose place he is selected to fill. Each of the members of the board shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The President shall designate one of the members as chairman of the board. The chairman shall be the chief executive officer of the board, and in his absence or disability the duties of his office shall be performed by someone of the other members to be designated as acting chairman by the chairman in such order as he may determine. The board shall supervise the Federal home-loan banks created by this act, shall perform the other duties specifically prescribed by this act, and shall have power to adopt, amend, and require the observance of such rules, regulations, and orders as shall be necessary from time to time for carrying out the purposes of the provisions of this act. The board shall have power to suspend or remove any director, officer, employee, or agent of any Federal home-loan bank, the cause of such suspension or removal to be communicated in writing forthwith to such director, officer, employee, or agent, and to such Federal home-loan bank.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: On page 29, line 16, after the word "States" insert a comma and the words "not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to discuss this amendment. We just overlooked making this a bipartisan board. The same provision has been adopted with respect to all the boards we are creating:

Not more than three of whom shall be of the same political party.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to sympathize with this idea; but I think the gentleman is correct, that it was done in the case of the Federal Reserve Board and the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I wish it were not so, but I can not help that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SPARKS: Page 30, line 7, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$9,000."

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, under existing conditions, $9,000 is a large enough salary. After the reductions provided in the economy bill are made, if that bill is passed, Congressmen will not receive quite this sum; and I do not understand why the members of this board should receive a salary in excess of that which Congressmen are now receiving.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETTENGILL: On page 30, line 7, after the word "annum," add "but during the fiscal year 1932–33 the salary shall be $9,000 per annum."

Mr. PETTENGILL. The purpose of this amendment is simply to cut the salary during the next fiscal year in keeping with the policy of Congress with respect to all other salary cuts, simply for the one year.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with these amendments is that we do not know whether this bill will become a law first or the economy bill will become a law first. If this bill becomes law fixing the salary at $9,000 a year, then after the economy bill is passed the salary will be cut to $8,100.

Mr. PETTENGILL. My amendment reads that the salary shall be $10,000 per annum but that during the fiscal year 1933 the salary shall be $9,000 per annum.

Mr. LUCE. I see no objection to that if it would not be the fact that the economy bill enacted afterwards would cut it down.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman does not quite catch the language employed. The language specifically fixes the salary at $9,000 for the year 1932–33 without reference to any other provision; and no matter what language might be employed as to other things this language would stand making the salary $9,000 for that year.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the entire sentence with the perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will so read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each of the members of the board shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum, but during the fiscal year 1932–33 the salary shall be $9,000 per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman is in error in describing it as the fiscal year 1932–33. I think the gentleman intends to refer to the fiscal year 1933, which begins on July 1 of this year.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment as corrected by the insertion be again reported.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Also strike out the word "but," and insert the words "provided, however."

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETTENGILL: On page 30, line 7, after the word "annum," insert: "Provided, however, That during the fiscal year 1933 the salary shall be $9,000 per annum."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I think any difficulty in the matter can be straightened out in conference, so I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. (a) Any organization organized under the laws of any State and subject to inspection and regulation under the banking or similar laws of such State shall be eligible to become a member under this act if—

(1) It is organized solely for the purpose of supplying credit to its members;

(2) Its membership (A) is confined exclusively to building and loan associations, savings and loan associations, cooperative banks, and homestead associations; or (B) is confined exclusively to insurance companies; or (C) is confined exclusively to savings banks; and

(3) Of the institutions to which its membership is confined which are organized within the State, its membership includes a majority of such institutions.

(b) The board shall determine the amount of stock which shall be subscribed by such an organization for the purpose of becoming a member. In all other respects, but subject to such additional rules and regulations as the board may provide, any such organization shall be a member for the purposes of this act.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: On page 38, line 6, strike out the words "or (B) is confined exclusively to insurance companies," and change the letter (C) to (B) in line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. Each Federal home loan bank shall have succession until dissolved by the board under this act or by further act of Congress.

SEC. 25. Whenever the board finds that the efficient and economical accomplishment of the purposes of this act will be aided by such action, and in accordance with such rules, regulations, and orders as the board may prescribe, any Federal home loan bank may be liquidated or reorganized, and its stock paid off and retired in whole or in part in connection therewith after paying or making provision for the payment of its liabilities. In the case of any such liquidation or reorganizaion, any other Federal home loan bank may, with the approval of the board, acquire assets of any such liquidated or reorganized bank and assume liabilities thereof, in whole or in part.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is indeed gratifying and pleasing to feel that within a few moments this bill, which is now only applicable, as amended, to the building and loan associations and, in some instances, savings banks, will pass. I shall not speak on the bill or of the benefits that will accrue to hundreds of thousands of small home and property owners inasmuch as I have done this at some length on June 10 when speaking in regard to the adoption of a special rule that would make possible the consideration and passage of this measure. All I wish to say now is that it is much needed and that it will be helpful not only to the home owners and the small banks that have aided the building and loan associations, but that it will also aid, as I have stated many times before, the municipalities and the States in collecting their taxes that are long overdue.

But I arose, Mr. Chairman, mainly for the purpose of congratulating the Banking and Currency Committee, its subcommittee, and its members for the great service which they have rendered to the House and to the country during this session of Congress. Though this is a new committee, its members have worked with cohesion and superb harmony—conditions which made their achievements and accomplishments possible.

The members of the committee, including the Republican minority, have been honest and sincere in their devotion and application to duty and have worked incessantly and with perseverance on the many important bills that have been referred to them, and they have reported and succeeded in securing the passage of the most important legislation thus far enacted in this House. They had passed, within a few days after Congress convened, the all-important Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill; and though the committee members had deviated from my bill, I know that they had done this because they believed that the statements of prominent officials and certain economists of high standing, good judgment, experience, and knowledge carried more weight than my own humble recommendations. But I feel they are commencing to realize now that it would have been much wiser if they had adopted my plan of specifically naming the directors of the corporation and of capitalizing this corporation at $1,000,000,000 and giving it the power to issue bonds to the extent of five times the capital structure; in that way the benefits, which were contemplated and which were thought would accrue to the country, would have been carried out and we would not have been called upon for the third time, as we are now, to increase the bonding power of the corporation. Nor would it have been necessary to legislate specially for the relief of municipalities and States, inasmuch as I had provided for this contingency in my bill, relief that must be forthcoming before we adjourn, and that, if originally provided for, would have made it possible for the municipalities and States, as well as private industry, to give employment to many of those who are on the brink of despair due to their inability to obtain work.

I am satisfied that if this committee as constituted had been in control two years ago it would have also recommended and succeeded in passing a bill extending the rediscount power of the Federal Reserve Board similar to the one which this committee has so speedily recommended and enacted during this session of Congress. In addition to these two important measures, the Banking and Currency Committee has reported and the House has passed the important bill guaranteeing bank deposits, as well as the Goldsborough equality bill, and, as I have stated, we are about to pass in a few moments this all-important home loan bank bill—a bill that is of tremendous import to the home and property owners of the Nation and that is bound to be full of blessing and benefit to every section of our country.

I am delighted to have the privilege of voting for a bill which I have advocated for over a year and a half.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I know the gentleman will be interested in the statement carried in the press this morning that the Senate has adopted the House bill as its own bill in an effort, I think, to expedite the passage of the legislation.

Mr. SABATH. As to the interesting information imparted to the House by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], I should like to ask whether the favorable action on the part of the Senate in passing the House bill, as originally planned by this splendid Banking and Currency subcommittee and as improved by the whole committee, was to deprive this House and this hard-working and deserving committee of credit, or whether they desired to steal the credit for this legislation from the Democratic House to enable them to use their hackneyed expression, "We look with pride," and so forth? I concede that they must take some credit from the Democrats, for God only knows how they could look with pride to any accomplishment in President Hoover's administration, unless it be that it is a great achievement to straddle the prohibition question with a camouflaging declaration and with much buncombe. But the Republicans are not only resourceful but devoid of shame, always claiming credit for anything that is beneficial and always unloading the responsibility on the Democratic Party for all of their misdeeds. Therefore the passage of this bill in the Senate to-day without the House amendment is in all likelihood due to the fact that the Republicans wish to have it appear that it is one of their accomplishments, and this notwithstanding that I have pleaded for such legislation on this floor for nearly two years.

Of course, at this time it might be more appropriate for the Republicans to use their other trite expression: "We look with apprehension, and so forth." Surely that would appear more proper if they would but only realize the destruction and suffering they have caused the Nation. But I feel it is immaterial what they say or what they will do, for the American people have lost confidence in the Republican Party and will hold it responsible for the most devastating social and economic debacle in the history of our Nation. The people of the Nation realize that the administration is controlled by the international bankers and unscrupulous Wall Street manipulators, and that it will not legislate in the interest of the masses, or protect them.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. SPARKS. The Senate will further demonstrate its wisdom if it will accept the amendments which have been added to the bill in the House, will it not?

Mr. SABATH. I believe that the amendments which the members of the committee now present, in conjunction with the members of this committee, have adopted will improve the bill and that they will eliminate every possible objection that can be raised to it. The amendments which have been adopted will make the bill applicable to those States which have been so far behind the times as not to have provided legislation on this subject. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, not only is the Banking and Currency Committee of the House entitled to appreciation and credit from this Congress, notwithstanding the slurs, attacks, and vilifications that have been heaped upon it by the Republican press and the greedy interests, but it is entitled to a special vote of thanks because it has striven honestly and conscientiously to relieve the country of the great depression and unemployment. But I regret to say that regardless of its extraordinary devotion to duty and its achievements and our own efforts, I can see no real relief in the offing so long as the party in power is devoid of feeling for the suffering people of this Nation, and particularly so long as President Hoover is controlled by Wall Street and the international bankers. But let the country not despair, for the election is rapidly approaching; and I repeat what I said on this floor in 1912, that after all the people can be trusted and that they will again realize and appreciate that the Democratic Party is the only party that will bring prosperity to all. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks so that I may more fittingly pay my respects to this splendid Committee on Banking and Currency and to each member thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to say that as one member of the Committee on Banking and Currency I appreciate the compliment paid the committee by our colleague from Illinois.

I believe this measure is one that will render real relief and be more helpful to a larger number of people than any measure that has been considered or enacted by this Congress.

While I regret exceedingly the conditions or rather the situation with reference to governmental finances which have about reached the breaking point, I do not offer this statement as an apology for my vote. It is simply a question of duty to country. I say to our veterans it is a question of capacity to pay on the part of your Government.

I am convinced beyond doubt that the imposition of the burden upon our Government at this time will do irreparable harm to millions of our citizens, it will cheapen the dollar, add unreasonably to the cost of living, add to the ranks of the unemployed, and weaken the very foundation of our financial structure. Our duty should be clear.

I will yield to none in my appreciation or gratitude to our soldiers. I am not voting against the soldier; I am voting as they fought, for the country we all love, and we must maintain its financial integrity.

In my 15 years of service in Congress I have favored all legislation that I felt would be beneficial to the soldiers not only of the World War but of the Spanish-American War and the Civil War, without apology to anyone for my so doing.

I am sure our World War veterans fully understand the crisis confronting the country. They well realize that it is a question of providing relief to each and every citizen and getting our unemployed back to work at the earliest date possible. We have legislation on the way to enactment that should accomplish this end. It should not be necessary and is not necessary for our veterans to cash in on their adjusted-compensation certificates to provide the necessities of life. These certificates were given to our soldiers as a handsel of the appreciation of the American people for their services to our country. We must and will provide relief or jobs for all without preference and with the least sacrifice on the part of all. I am sure the people I have the honor to represent can but approve my course. I believe my vote will voice the major sentiment of those who have honored me for these many years.

I recall another occasion in this House when the Nation committed itself to prohibition. I voted against the resolution submitting the eighteenth amendment, I voted against the Volstead Act, and was one of the 55 Members of this House who voted to sustain President Wilson's veto of the Volstead Act, and I look forward with satisfaction to the opportunity, which I feel will come in the very near future, when I can vote for an outright repeal of the eighteenth amendment and destroy an infliction on our country that has done more harm to the body politic and the morals of our country than all the wars and pestilences we have passed through. Rid the country of this evil and we will go far toward solving the finances of our Government and the reemployment of our people. A noble experiment we must concede, but the most humiliating failure a civilized people ever experienced.

(Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania asked and was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the distinguished gentleman from Illinois for his kind words regarding the work of the Banking and Currency Committee during this session. I want to say that the gentleman from Illinois has been of great help to our committee. He has blazed the way for us in connection with some of the most important legislation our committee has considered during the session.

In connection with the bill now before the committee, let me say that on account of the large number of bills before us I appointed a subcommittee consisting of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I wish upon my own part and on behalf of the House to express our gratitude to the subcommittee, who are entitled to much credit for the preparation of this bill. [Applause.] In that connection I wish to say that this measure involves questions exceedingly technical, intricate, and difficult. The subcommittee devoted itself for weeks with great industry and splendid ability to the task of preparing this most difficult piece of legislation. I am sure I voice the sentiment of the House when I say we are under obligations to them for the splendid work they have done on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. Any institution, except a national bank, organized under any law of the United States, including the laws relating to the District of Columbia, shall be authorized to subscribe for stock of a Federal home loan bank if otherwise eligible to make such subscription under the terms of this act, any provision in any such law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 39, line 8, after the word "bank" in said line, insert the words "State banks, insurance companies, and trust companies."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment carries out the action which the House has already taken.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to overlook one provision in the bill to which my attention has been called. I have not had an opportunity to discuss this with other members of the committee and I desire to call their attention to it now.

I am going to ask for the present that the committee consent that the provision in subdivision (f) on page 36 go out of the bill with the understanding that if it is desirable to do so, it can be restored in conference. The provision is:

The Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department is authorized to detect, arrest, and deliver into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction any person committing any of the offenses punishable under this act.

The Department of Justice has called my attention to this language and if I understood clearly, in a hurried conversation over the phone, what was said to me by the department official, this language is regarded as more or less confusing. If the language is stricken out entirely, these investigations will find their way into the secret service of the Treasury or into the special investigation bureau of the Department of Justice or wherever they normally would fall in the absence of this provision. The only thing that could be accomplished by the provision would be to restrict or to confuse authority for these investigations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any penalty clause in any other provision of the bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then this language is not necessary.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Would it not be better to leave the language in and take it out in conference? If the language is left out, it can not be put back in conference.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I am informed the Senate has reported the bill as reported to the House with this provision in it. If it is in the bill as passed by the Senate and is also carried in the House bill, under the rules the conferees would have no authority to strike it out.

Mr. GOSS. By the same token, if this language is not contained in the Senate bill, it could not be put back in conference if it were stricken out now.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is true.

Mr. GOSS. Would it not be better to change the language in some way so that the provision would be subject to agreement in conference?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Senate has reported this identical bill and this provision is not necessary anyway. I am sure of that.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman assure us that this language is in the Senate bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that subdivision (f), on page 36, lines 8 to 12, inclusive, be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, my attention was distracted for the moment. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina if the words "insurance companies" were taken out of the bill on page 38?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that language was taken out. The correction was also made on page 39.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 28. I do so partly to ask the propriety of such a provision. Bills usually do not carry the right to amend or repeal, because we always have that right. What I am fearful of is that if we had this provision in ninety-nine out of one hundred bills and one bill was in question it might raise some problem.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will yield, this is a bill granting a charter, and charters are contracts, and it has been held by a very respectable court that sits in this Capitol frequently, that if you grant a contract by statute you are bound by it, and you can not alter, amend, or repeal it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am as familiar with that as the gentleman from South Carolina. But this bill contains many provisions other than granting a charter, and, furthermore, the bill itself is not a bill which grants charters.

Mr. STEVENSON. It gives authority to grant charters, and a charter granted by that authority is as absolute as if granted by Congress. In addition to that the rights here are granted on institutions growing out of the power granted by the charter, and the contention would be made that any right growing out of this power to grant charters could be a contract against the power to repeal or amend.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If that is so, why do you not say that any charter granted under this act may be altered, amended, or repealed?

Mr. STEVENSON. We do say it by saying that we retain the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I object to is that you are going to pass legislation other than charters, and you put in a gratuitous expression that Congress can alter, amend, or repeal that legislation; and you are going to get into trouble with some bill. I think it is a foolish and ridiculous provision in any piece of legislation.

Mr. STEVENSON. This language has come down from the fathers. It may be foolish, it may be unnecessary, it may be ridiculous, but we have inherited it from a long line of statesmen that have adorned the pages of history, and from a long line of eminent lawyers who have gone from our sight.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina to point out one piece of legislation in this Congress that has such a provision in it.

Mr. REILLY. I think the gentleman will find that charters of this and all banks have the same provision.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. CELLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks and to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, before doing that I ask unanimous consent that House Resolutions 165, 215, and 238 may lie on the table. These are resolutions that were reported by the Committee on Rules and have already been adopted and acted upon. They are still on the calendar, and the purpose of this request is to get them off the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With reference to the business for to-morrow, I am requested to announce by the majority leader, now occupying the chair, that it will be the purpose of the Committee on Rules to call up and undertake to dispose of as many of the pending rules as will be possible during to-morrow's session. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is the pending measure and has not been disposed of. After that is disposed of, to-morrow I expect to call up the rule providing for the consideration of the bill for the allocation of 50,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton to be assigned to the Red Cross for relief purposes. Also I hope to call up the kidnaping bill and several others if we can find time to do it to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to call up the rules en bloc and pass them or to call them up seriatim?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the more orderly procedure will be to dispose of them in turn.

RATE OF WAGES FOR LABORERS AND MECHANICS ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report (H. Rept. 1634) on the bill S. 3847, entitled "An act to amend an act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings," for printing under the rule.

HON. MEYER JACOBSTEIN

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks concerning our former colleague, Meyer Jacobstein.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me for extension of remarks, I present the following concerning our former colleague, Hon. Meyer Jacobstein, of Rochester, N. Y.:

New York State is soon to elect two Congressmen at large. In the history of the State this has occurred only twice: In the Forty-third Congress (1873–1875) Hon. Lyman Tremain, of Albany, represented the State as Congressman at large, and in the Forty-eighth Congress (1883–1885) Hon. Henry W. Slocum, of Brooklyn, filled the same office.

In the coming election the people of that State are to choose two Congressmen at large. New York is the most powerful State in the Union, and it is therefore essential that for this post there should be selected two of its outstanding citizens. There will be two candidates from each of the major parties. I am concerned with the choice that will be made by the Democratic Party.

I offer for consideration the name of Hon. Meyer Jacobstein, of Rochester, N. Y., who formerly represented in Congress the major portion of Monroe County, wherein lies the city of Rochester. He was first elected in 1922, in a strongly intrenched Republican district, for the Sixty-eighth Congress, was reelected to the Sixty-ninth Congress by a majority of more than 30,000 over the Republican candidate, and was again elected to the Seventieth Congress. His record at Washington was so fine and outstanding that his constituency, representing both parties, sent him back each time with an increasing plurality.

Jacobstein, therefore, is not a tyro. He formerly was professor of political economy in the State University of North Dakota and also in the University of Rochester. If there is anything the House of Representatives needs, it is trained economists. They are needed in the debates on the floor and around the conference tables. In these times of stress clear thinking and leadership are unquestionably required. We have too little of these qualities in the House and still less in the Senate, and not even a modicum in the White House. As special agent of the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce, director of emergency employment management under the War Industries Board of the War Department, and mediator for the clothing industry, Jacobstein gained an invaluable experience in some of the practical problems of government. He was appointed delegate at large from New York State to the Democratic National Convention in 1924, and declined the nomination as Democratic candidate for mayor of the city of Rochester, N. Y., in 1925.

While a Member of the House, Jacobstein not infrequently took part in debates on the floor, and when he did, the attentive listening of his colleagues was marked, and they usually followed his words of wisdom.

As a member of important congressional committees his work was most significant. For eight years the House had violated the clear mandate of the Constitution in the matter of reapportionment. It had failed to reapportion on the basis of the 1920 census. The States which would lose representation under reapportionment constituted an impassable barrier to the passage of any reapportionment bill. There was a hopeless tangle, and it was the ingenuity and tact of Meyer Jacobstein that cut the Gordian knot and enabled Congress to function constitutionally and pass the reapportionment act of 1928.

No Member of the House rendered greater service to the country on questions of the tariff, finance, labor legislation, immigration, and agricultural relief. He opposed the fantastic schemes for farm relief which became laws. Had his advice been heeded, much of the embarrassment to the present administration and great wastage of the people's money in setting up the establishment known as the Federal Farm Board would have been avoided.

Recently, Governor Roosevelt appointed Jacobstein a member of the Joint Legislative Commission of New York State to investigate utility companies doing interstate business with adjoining States. This commission is authorized to negotiate treaties with the States concerned for equitable terms in transmission of power into New York State, and submit its recommendations to the legislature and the Congress. Jacobstein himself is thoroughly familiar with the difficult problems of water-power utilization and has allied himself with the progressives dealing with this important and intricate subject.

The democracy of Meyer Jacobstein is unquestioned. His character is unassailable. His understanding of present-day economic questions is well known. His experience and attainments make him, indeed, worthy and well qualified, and his popularity with the voters generally throughout the State would insure his election.

RELIEF

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the relief bill, and to include therein an article I received upon that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, balancing the Budget is necessary, but the all-important question is placing the unemployed to work. Until the purchasing power of the masses is restored we can not expect better conditions than now confront us. To restore purchasing power ways must be found to place the unemployed in the position where they have earning power.

I have advocated a shorter work week, and it is my opinion that the Government will be required to lead the way in this direction. We can not go on with one group of our citizens employed and able to purchase the necessities of life while another group is unable to find employment and finds it necessary to exist through the generosity of those who are fortunate enough to have an income.

This is not a political question, it is a question that confronts the Nation as a whole, and we must find a way to solve it. Our people are overburdened with taxes—national, State, and local. While this Congress will reduce our annual appropriations nearly a billion dollars and the State and local governments will be required to do likewise, it is not solving the all-important question—that of increasing the earning power of our citizens. The fact is that we are reducing the earning power when we reduce salaries and reduce the number of people employed. To date, Congress has reduced appropriations for the next fiscal year starting July 1 nearly $650,000,000, and a further reduction is on the way. It is estimated that 50 per cent or more of this money has been used for personnel. That means employees who have earned $325,000,000 during the past year will lose their positions because there will be no money to pay their salaries. Thousands upon thousands of employees of the Government will soon join the unemployed. It can not be prevented.

Placing the cold facts squarely before the people of this country is essential. No publication—daily, weekly, or monthly—has, to my mind, been more prominent in presenting the facts than has the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Numerous articles on the depression, which required weeks of study in preparation, have appeared in this paper, and the more important ones have found their way into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Last Sunday there appeared another outstanding article on this subject and, under permission granted me, I insert that article as part of my remarks. The article follows:

THE INTIMATE RELATION BETWEEN WAGES, PURCHASING POWER, AND THE DEPRESSION—NATIONAL PAY ROLL DECLINED FROM $52,000,000,000 IN 1929 TO $33,150,000,000 IN 1931—"BEFORE WE START BACK ON THE ROAD TO PROSPERITY," SAYS SENATOR BORAH, "WE MUST INCREASE THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE MASSES"—MOUNTING COST OF GOVERNMENT COMPARED WITH SHRINKING INCOMES

(By Charles G. Ross, chief Washington correspondent of the Post-Dispatch)

WASHINGTON, June 11.—It is now generally recognized, alike by economists and the more thoughtful politicians, that the return of normal business conditions in the United States awaits the restoration of the purchasing power of the masses.

This proposition was stated in the Post-Dispatch article on "The Country's Plight" last November. Senator Wagner, of New York, states it when, in advocating his emergency construction program, he says that "we can not starve or stint ourselves back to prosperity" but must put money in the pockets of those who are now jobless by giving them jobs. Supporters of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, to provide aid at the top of the industrial and financial structure, justified their votes on the ground that the good effects of the bill would not be confined to the top but would trickle down to the man at the bottom.

POWER TO BUY ESSENTIAL

They emphasized the necessity of building up purchasing power. If this were done, the people would resume their normal buying at the stores; the stores would take more from the manufacturers; the manufacturers would increase their purchases from the primary producers—and all of us, including the bankers, would take new heart and courage and set the country back on its feet.

With the efficacy of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and similar measures we are not here concerned; the point is simply that behind them all, whether they are concerned initially with employment or not, is the thought that the purchasing power of the people—not of a few people but of the great majority—must somehow be lifted above the present ruinous levels.

That is what is meant by those who say commodity prices must be increased. For if the people, with more money in their pockets as the result of more jobs, start buying, then "distress selling" will cease, prices will rise, the wheels of industry will start humming, and so on through the whole beneficent circle back to the creation of more jobs and more purchasing power.

HOW THE CIRCLE WIDENS

We are now in the evil circle that begins and ends with fewer jobs and smaller purchasing power. All of us, through our experience of the last two and a half years, know how the depression works. Every deflationary process begets another. For instance: A building project here in Washington is suspended; an architect employed upon it loses his job; he has to give up his office in a building from which a research institution derives an important part of its income; this income having been reduced, the institution lays off one of its scientific workers. The dismissal of this scholar is directly traceable back to the architect's loss of his job, which, in turn, had been caused by the Government's deficit, which had been caused by the plight of industry, which plight had been caused by the inability of the people to buy the products of industry. All along the line there has been stark human tragedy. At the beginning of the line and again at the end of it there is diminished purchasing power.

This sort of thing has been multiplied thousands upon thousands of times since the depression gripped America. Until a movement is started in the other direction there can be no genuine prosperity.

No matter from what angle we approach the problem, whether as advocates of aid from the bottom upward or the top downward, we reach the conclusion that purchasing power must be increased.

WASHINGTON PROVIDES A PROOF

The widespread acceptance of this conclusion as axiomatic represents a long step forward in the economic thinking of the country. It is only within recent months that it has been so accepted.

The truth of the proposition has been clearly illustrated in the city of Washington. Washington up to now through all the depression has been a reasonably prosperous city. The stores have done a good business; no banks have failed; rents have held up; there has been comparatively little unemployment. The reason is simple. By reason of the fixed Government pay roll, Washington has had a stable purchasing power. What will happen when Government wages are cut and this purchasing power is correspondingly reduced remains to be seen.

There is a lesson in the great depression of 1873–1879. At the beginning of 1879, after six hard years, the country saw no prospect of relief. Suddenly the clouds lifted. The end of the depression came about through a purely fortuitous circumstance. At the same time that the wheat crop failed in Europe the United States had a bumper crop. Wheat prices rose materially above the level of the previous year. The farmer began to make money and spend it. The railroads derived a double benefit from carrying wheat to the seaboard and bringing back goods to the farms. Presently they were in the market for new equipment. Business picked up all around, and the country entered upon a period of prosperity.

All this was the result of one fundamental change—the restoration of the buying power of the great consuming population on the farms. The point is not invalidated by the fact that the change was accidental. Good times came to a large part of the population, and soon the benefits were diffused through the whole social structure. Prosperity rested on the firm and broad base created by mass consumption.

BORAH'S CONCLUSIONS

The prime importance of distributing our national income in a way that will permit the people again to buy the mass production of our machines—the importance of attacking the depression in its root cause—has been nowhere better stated than by Senator BORAH in his eloquent speech last week against the sales tax.

"The moment we laid a sales tax," said BORAH, "we would serve notice on at least 70,000,000 people to curtail their purchasing power. It would do little good in the present situation to increase the purchasing power of a few people. Before we start back on the road to prosperity we must increase the purchasing power of the masses, the millions.

"The moment we laid a sales tax, that moment we would press down more heavily upon the millions of people who are now living close to the border line of necessity, and notify them that if they were to get through the year they must cut expenses. Instead of starting on the road to recovery we would be laying a tax which would paralyze the very activities which are necessary in order that we may recover."

DECLINES IN WAGES

If further evidence of the relationship of decreased purchasing power to the depression is needed, it can be found in a set of figures prepared for the Post-Dispatch by Dr. Isador Lubin, an economist of the Brookings Institution, from official reports. Doctor Lubin is recognized in Washington as an expert on the unemployment problem. He has frequently been called into consultation by congressional committees working on unemployment There is no more competent authority in his line.

The figures are startling.

To begin with, he takes the total manufacturing wage payments in 1929 and 1930 as estimated by the Federal Reserve Board. In 1929 they were $11,462,000,000 and in 1930 they were $9,303,000,000—a decline of 19 per cent.

Owing to the fact that employment in other lines of activity was maintained at a higher rate than in manufacturing, it is assumed that the decline in wages and salaries for the whole country was somewhat less, or about 15 per cent.

The total wage and salary bill of the country in 1929 approximated $52,000,000,000. A 15 per cent decline would amount to about $7,800,000,000, leaving the wage and salary bill for 1930 at $44,200,000,000.

The total manufacturing wage bill for 1931, as estimated by the Federal Reserve Board, was $7,019,000,000, a decline from 1930 of 25 per cent. It is estimated that wages and salaries in other lines of activity decline, because of unemployment and wage cuts, by at least the same proportion. Thus the wage and salary bill for 1931 is estimated to have been $11,050,000,000 smaller than in 1930, or a total decline for the two years of $18,850,000,000.

In other words, the wage and salary bill for 1931 stood at $33,150,000,000, as compared with $52,000,000,000 in 1929.

The estimate of the decline for the two years is regarded by Lubin as highly conservative. It runs much lower than the figures of the American Federation of Labor and an estimate made by Prof. W. M. Leiserson, of Antioch College.

ALMOST CUT IN HALVES

Lubin's figures are conservative also in comparison with tables published February 17, 1932, by the magazine the Business Week, under the heading "What Happened to the American Pocketbook, 1929 to 1931." It is there estimated that the wage and salary income of persons connected with all industries in the United States dropped from $47,889,000,000 to $24,932,000,000—a decrease of 47.95 per cent—and that all the forms of business income fell from $33,113,000,000 to $17,051,000,000, a decrease of 48.5 per cent. Civil and fiduciary incomes, including the pay of all Government employees, teachers' salaries, life-insurance payments to policyholders, and pensions, bounties, etc., paid by all Government divisions, increased 22 per cent, or from $8,572,000,000 to $10,459,000,000.

The grand total of all these forms of income as computed by the Business Week was $89,584,000,000 in 1929, and $52,446,000,000 in 1931—a decline of 41.46 per cent.

"This is the greatest decline in national income of which we have any record," comments the magazine, "and brings the figure for 1931 approximately back to the average level of 1917–18. The deflation from the peak figures of 1929 was about 41.5 per cent, somewhat in excess of the decline in the volume of general business activity as measured by any of the usual indexes, and almost three times as great as the decline between 1920 and 1921."

PRICE LEVELS WIPED OUT

A chart published with the article "shows how the inflation of the national income during the war and postwar years, accompanying the tremendous rise in price levels, was almost wiped out by the end of 1930. During 1931 the national income fell far below the normal line of increase based on the average rate of growth for the 50 years preceding the war.

"The dotted line in the chart, in which the effect of changes in the general price level is eliminated, indicates that the decline in national income in 1930 and 1931 was considerably more than can be accounted for by mere changes in the value of the dollar and represents an actual contraction of the current national purchasing power on a tremendous scale, bringing it back to the 1921 level. The chart is a graphic demonstration of the destructive effects of an uncontrolled deflation on the standard of living."

The National Industrial Conference Board recently undertook a survey to determine the extent to which salaries and wages have been cut during the depression—a subject, says the board, concerning which "there has been a tendency to avoid publicity."

REPORTS FROM EMPLOYERS

A report on the survey is published in the board's May 30, 1932, Service Letter on Industrial Relations. Replies were received from 1,718 concerns. They employed 3,258,666 persons in 1929. The total employment had declined to 2,391,009 in 1932, a reduction of 26.6 per cent.

"The results of this survey," says the board, "indicate that the policy of reducing compensation scales has become widespread. On the basis of information from 1,718 concerns in the leading fields of American business it appears that 80.5 per cent of these companies have reduced executive salaries, 81 per cent have reduced other salaries, and 75.4 have reduced wage rates."

President Hoover in his Indianapolis speech last summer, using figures of the Department of Commerce, estimated that the average annual production of movable goods in the United States before the depression was about $50,000,000,000, and that this had been cut to $12,000,000,000.

Why this tremendous shrinkage?

The figures on the decline of purchasing power represented by wages and salaries—a decline which has become constantly heavier—supply the biggest part of the answer.

Evidence accumulates of a growing realization that the purchasing power of the masses can only be restored by giving them jobs. President Hoover—and with him Senator LA FOLLETTE—urged his payless furlough plan in the Government service in preference to other wage-reduction plans, on the ground that the former would not only keep employees from being turned off but would permit the addition of workers. He called upon the Government to accept in its emergency the principle of the 5-day week.

Only in one way, it is realized, can jobs be given to all, and that is by shortening the hours of work. No other answer is mathematically possible.

The following is an editorial in the same paper, which followed the article:

JOBS OR THE DOLE?

Soon after the depression set in a great American delusion came into being. Our troubles, said many in high places, arose through no fault of our own, but from world causes over which we had no control. It was a facile and comforting explanation, absolving our leaders of the responsibility of doing anything to remedy the disease, and it was couched in such smooth and plausible phrases—like "world dislocation caused by the war," "overproduction of raw materials," "insufficient gold supply," and so on—that it became the generally accepted explanation.

The depression deepened, and after a while it became possible for realists, like Dean Donham, of Harvard, to get a hearing. They brought some hard, gritty facts into the discussion. The chief of these was that the depression, though accentuated by world conditions, was fundamentally made in America and that it lay within the power of America, independently of what the rest of the world might do, to achieve a large measure of recovery. It gradually came to be understood that what was wrong, fundamentally, was the steady decline in the purchasing power of the great mass of the people, and that not until this purchasing power had been built back to a satisfactory level could the country hope to attain the widely diffused well-being to which its natural wealth and its technical manufacturing skill entitled it.

The Post-Dispatch stated these conclusions and buttressed them with the words of eminent thinkers in its article on the country's plight last November.

A complementary article published in the editorial section of the Post-Dispatch yesterday sets out in cold figures the root causes of our continuing plight. Between 1929 and 1931, according to the conservative estimates of Dr. Isador Lubin, an economist of the Brookings Institution, there was a decline of over 36 per cent, or from $50,000,000,000 to $33,150,000,000, in the wage and salary bill of the United States. Other authorities estimate the decline at an even higher figure, but Lubin's figures are startling enough. Placed alongside the estimate of President Hoover last summer, in his Indianapolis speech, that the annual production of movable goods in the United States had fallen from $50,000,000,000 to $38,000,000,000, they tell the story, basically, of what is wrong with the United States. Since the estimates were made there have been further drops both in the wage bill and in production. Inevitably, they go downhill together. Production is off for the simple reason that the people, through the loss of jobs and through wage cuts, have lost a great part of their power to buy.

The thing seems obvious, and yet there are those who seek to minimize the effects of unemployment. They do the Nation no service. Before we can hope to cure the disease, we must know precisely what the disease is. After such a display of evidence as that furnished by the authorities quoted in our article yesterday, how can there be left any faint shadow of doubt as to the cause of our troubles?

That cause is the lack of purchasing power, and the lack of purchasing power of the masses is the result of their lack of jobs.

As this is written, a significant bit of evidence of the truth of this conclusion comes in a news dispatch from Washington. It quotes the Federal Reserve Board's report that the value of department-store sales in May of this year was 24 per cent smaller than in May of last year, and it adds:

"The fifth Federal reserve district of Richmond made the best comparative showing, its decrease from last year being only 18 per cent. This was due, presumably, to the expenditure by Government employees in Washington, D. C., a part of the fifth district, whose purchasing power has not been decreased."

Unemployment is the great problem in the United States today. It overshadows all others. Most of our economic ills—our bank failures, our loss of dividends, our Government deficit—flow from it or are merely symptoms of the disease. Restore employment, and we shall be started back on the high road to better times.

Now, as the Post-Dispatch has pointed out, there is just so much work to be done, and owing to the machine and improved technological processes, the amount of this work—the work necessary to supply all our needs and comforts—steadily decreases. Our problem is to spread this available work among those who are able and willing to work.

And that can only mean a shortening of the work day or work week. There is no other way in which jobs can be given to all the workers and their purchasing power be increased. The change to a shorter work day, say the 6-hour day, or the shorter work week (for the details are unimportant), will not be revolutionary, but only the extension of a development which has been going on for over a century. We have progressed gradually from a work day of 15 or 16 hours, to the 12-hour day, the 10-hour day, the 8-hour day. By enabling our work to be done with less and less man power, the machine now requires that we take an additional step in the same direction.

Primarily the problem is one that industry must work out for itself. As for the Government, it can set the example, as the Post-Dispatch previously has said, by making itself a model employer, just as it set an example by establishing the 8-hour day on the railroads. Through force of circumstances it seems, indeed, already about to accept the principle of the 5-day week in the Government service, as advocated by the President in his payless furlough plan.

For the moment the problem of the wage scales in industry is of secondary importance. The problem now is to get men back to work. Wage scales in existing circumstances are bound to be variable. A living wage, of course, is essential, but beyond that there can now be no hard and fast standard. Get men back to work—get the available supply of work passed around so that purchasing power will be diffused among the people—and wage adjustments can later be made to take care of inequities. The objective now to be won is the relief of unemployment.

Jobs must be found not only for the sake of industry but for the sake of government. Until the people are put to work the drain on the public funds for relief as well as on private charity will go on. If the Federal Government must appropriate vast sums for relief, the "balancing of the Budget" through the new tax bill will become an idle fiction.

Jobs for all who want and need jobs, through the obvious device of the shorter work day or work week—to this solution of the problem there is one alternative, and one only. That alternative is the dole.

Jobs or the dole—there is no other choice.

PROHIBITION

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly this Congress has been confronted with many perplexing problems more technical to deal with than the general public can possibly realize. As a result, Members of Congress, individually and collectively, have been severely criticized through the press and other propaganda agencies for inactivity, inability to reduce Federal taxes, and for failure to restore employment and prosperity to the country. I challenge this criticism for the reason that those who have been so prone to criticize have utterly failed in their endeavor to place the blame on the responsible shoulders.

How easily all of this condemnation could have been avoided, the Budget balanced, taxes reduced, and employment restored if President Hoover, in his advisory messages to the Congress, had advocated the enactment of legislation for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or the modification of the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture of light wines and beer. The opposition of the President and his advisors to measures of this kind, in view of the conditions existing throughout the country, is unexplainable. For example, the administration leaders led in the defeat of the Beck-Linthicum resolution, calling a constitutional convention to amend the eighteenth amendment, which would have met with popular approval in nearly every State in the Union. Further an amendment to the tax bill, providing for the modification of the Volstead Act so as to permit the legal manufacture of 2.75 beer, on which it was proposed to levy a tax of 3 cents per pint, which would have produced over $500,000,000 in revenue annually, an amount almost sufficient to balance the national Budget, was defeated largely through pressure of the administration leaders.

The farcical action of Congress in refusing to legalize beer in order to levy a tax that would bring $500,000,000 annual revenue into the Treasury, yet permitting a provision to remain in the tax bill, taxing wort, used in making home brew or illegal beer, at 5 cents per gallon, which the Treasury Department claims will bring in only $46,000,000 in revenue annually, is to say the least a spectacle of national hypocrisy. This provision was supported by prohibition Members of the House, but it appears to be nothing short of legal nullification.

Let us pause for the moment to consider the remedial features to the legalizing of the manufacture and sale of malt beverages. I have already pointed out that by taxation alone the United States Treasury would be enriched annually in the amount of $500,000,000. This, in the natural course of events, would be instrumental in reducing Federal taxes. Second: At the peak of the brewing industry the brewers and malsters employed about 100,000 men, including clerks, drivers, and salesmen. During the year 1918 there were eleven hundred breweries in active operation. To-day only a very limited number are running. If the manufacture and sale of malt beverages was legalized, think of the army of carpenters, painters, mechanics, electricians, plumbers, and laborers who would be required to condition and equip reopened breweries.

Think of the fuel that would have to be mined and shipped, the barley, hops, rice, and corn that would have to be purchased and transported, with the additional farm labor that would be required. Think of the demands for bottles, for cooperage, brewing, bottling, and refrigerating machinery, for labels and stationery, and it is easy to visualize a working force of one-half million men. On the basis of four to a family, this means housing, feeding, and clothing about 2,000,000 individuals. Think of the relief that would be afforded our unemployed and starving people in the crisis of to-day if only those whose misguided judgment has saddled our country with this obnoxious law were to use sound judgment.

The low-salaried Federal employee has been branded with the stigma of unpatriotism because of his opposition to a reduction in salary, but when we consider the conditions existing in the country to-day, undeniably because of this unenforceable law on our statute books, we begin to wonder whether or not our country has really become communistic.

Now, let us turn our thoughts to the evils of prohibition. Unquestionably, prohibition stands indicted on more counts than any criminal ever arraigned. The eighteenth amendment and the law purporting to be enacted in pursuance thereof are undeniably inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of the Constitution of the United States. Violation and disregard of it has been, and is, participated in, by all grades of society and by public servants entrusted with its enforcement. It has been the medium of disturbing time-honored international relations. Through it, the Federal Government has extended its activities into affairs which under the Constitution were guaranteed to local State governments and immunity from Federal interference. It has lowered the Government in the esteem of the people until it is the subject of world-wide ridicule and scorn. Under it our governmental system is being poisoned so insidiously as to seriously impair its efficiency, if not to endanger its continued existence.

The time has come for plain speaking. Unless we take immediate steps to preserve economic integrity we face political disintegration as a country. Until wages and salaries are reinstated, there will be no retail business, no wholesale business, no banking business, no building business, no transportation business, no profitable farming, or no manufacturing business.

Mr. Speaker, if we are sincere in our desire to bring about prosperity without reducing wages, increasing taxes, and further revolutionizing business, repeal the eighteenth amendment along with its enforcement provisions, the Volstead Act.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers relating to the bill H. R. 6270, introduced by my predecessor, no adverse report having been made to the House by the committee thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS (H. DOC. NO. 355)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 21 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, including the reports of the heads of the departments of the Philippine government, for the calendar year 1931.

I concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of War that this report be printed as a congressional document.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 15, 1932.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. BUCHANAN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

Mr. BULWINKLE, for two days, on account of absence from city.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker pro tempore:

H. R. 4738. An act to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to the discussion of this measure and the various views expressed by the members of the committee. I am impressed with the careful study and consideration which the subject has received by those having it in charge; and having discussed various features of the proposal from time to time with members of the committee, I realize the tremendous amount of time and energy spent in the preparation of the bill. As in most legislation, there are undoubtedly features of the bill which experience will indicate need revision, but in its general features I believe the proposal meets the situation it aims to correct admirably and should prove of tremendous value to the thousands who will be benefited by it.

The purposes of the bill, as has been commented upon, are twofold. The necessity for the establishment of such a system should be considered from two viewpoints—one, as a relief measure; the other, as a permanent addition to the banking facilities of this country. The desirability of such an organization has been recognized for some time, the necessity for such action has been made clear by the existing financial crisis.

Throughout the Nation, particularly in the urban communities, a tremendous number of home owners have been seriously distressed because of the economic situation. The citizen who has purchased or built his home and financed the operation through a mortgage or loan on his dwelling has found himself in many instances unable to meet his interest or principal payments and faced with the alternative of foreclosure and loss of his property. This has happened in thousands of cases where, because of existing conditions, the banks or holders of the mortgages have been forced to protect themselves and their customers by such action. Building and loan or home-building institutions have found themselves unable to help the situation because of lack of funds. It is to meet this emergency, to assist the home owner and maintain the credit of that great group of our citizens that is one of the immediate benefits of the bill. It is designed primarily to benefit that group of wage earners or men of moderate means through limitation of the value of the property.

It offers an opportunity to those in financial difficulties to refinance their obligations through long-time loans with building and loan associations. It grants the privilege to building and loan associations of discounting proper real-estate loans or borrowing upon them at the proposed home-loan banks, thereby permitting those building and loan associations to meet the withdrawal demands of those whose savings are deposited with them, or to have funds with which to meet the requirements of present or new members.

Ohio is one of the States of the Union which is a leader in building and loan and home-building associations. Its institutions are surrounded by State laws and their activities are supervised by a separate department of government. Millions of dollars of the citizens of the State have been invested in these associations, and these, in turn, are partly responsible for the tremendous number of home properties for which Ohio is proud. Since the population of Ohio, according to the census of 1930, is 60 per cent urban and 40 per cent rural, it is apparent a great part of these homes are in the towns and cities. My own city of Cleveland is noted as a city of homes, and in this respect is similar to its sister cities of the State in their proportion of actual home owners to inhabitants. It is to preserve these homes, to assist the great number of members of these home-building institutions, many of whom are in serious need of their savings deposited with these associations at present that favorable action on this measure is so earnestly desired. And because of the present distressing economic and financial situation and the necessity for immediate assistance this measure may properly be considered a relief measure.

Unlike the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal home-loan banks are proposed as an addition to the permanent banking facilities of the country. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was established to offer assistance of a temporary nature to industry, agriculture, railroads, and banks and their customers and depositors, in the belief that in normal times these activities and institutions have ample opportunity, through private capital and existing Government facilities, to meet their requirements. The Federal land banks and the Federal home-loan banks, however, are intended to offer facilities to the owners of farms and homes, not for the purpose of commercialism, but to promote and preserve that type of asset so necessary to the welfare of our country.

The facilities offered provide ample opportunity for the home owner to finance himself on a long-time basis through building and loan or home-building associations, members of the home-loan banks, and make it possible for associations of that type to assist home builders on proper undertakings of this nature. The assistance made possible for the home owner, the removal of fear of loss of property because of short-term mortgages, and the possibility of long-time financing should be of great value to the great home-owning class of citizens of this country. The bill limits the powers of the home-loan banks to loan only on moderate-priced homes, in that collateral for loans on real estate with respect to which the home mortgage is given can not exceed $20,000. No home mortgage may be accepted if the loan secured by it has more than 15 years to run to maturity. It is essentially a measure for the benefit of the man of moderate circumstances.

The desirability of such a permanent addition to our banking facilities is further emphasized by the fact that during the past few years State and National banks have been withdrawing more and more from the field of construction loans, and it seems reasonable to assume that upon the return to normalcy applications for construction loans will not be given the consideration by such financial institutions as in the past. This work must, then, of necessity be taken up by building and loan associations and the proposed facilities as offered by this measure should be of great service in that respect.

Furthermore, banks have in the past refunded loans of building and loan associations when such loans had been partially and properly reduced, thereby providing those associations with funds to make new loans. It is questionable whether banks will be disposed to cooperate in this respect in the future as formerly because of the many criticisms of this practice and, consequently, such home-loan banks will fill an essential need in offering facilities where these mortgages may be used.

I do feel, however, the full value of the measure has been weakened by the elimination of State banks and trust companies from the list of those eligible to become members of these home-loan banks. I realize the weight of the argument that institutions engaged in commercial banking should not have their funds invested in long-time real-estate loans.

On the other hand, banks and trust companies have mortgage loans running into millions of dollars and are serving thousands of citizens, many of whom, in small communities, do not have the facilities of a building and loan association near at hand. While it is true that banks and trust companies, in many instances, do not make loans for more than a year, and at the end of that period either renew or carry the paper as past due, I can not see the force of the argument that these institutions should not qualify as members if the mortgage loans which they hold qualify for discount under the provisions of the act. I believe the service offered to the home owner should be of prime consideration, and I am not convinced this can be best accomplished through building and loan associations alone; in fact, I question whether such associations could handle all home-loan transactions if the banks interpreted the intention of the act to that effect.

The measure, however, as presented offers tremendous opportunities for constructive good, now and in the future. The restoration of confidence in the minds of the home owners, the release of frozen assets, and the release to the many depositors of their much-needed savings will be felt in every district in the country. I know the conditions existing throughout my district, and I have no hesitancy in heartily indorsing the proposed act, feeling confident the enactment of the bill will meet with hearty approval and bring much-needed relief to great numbers in the twenty-second district and believing it to be one of the most commendable and far-reaching measures proposed by this Congress.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 16, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1932

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 15, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Davis	King	Shipstead
Austin	Dill	La Follette	Shortridge
Bankhead	Fletcher	Logan	Smoot
Barbour	Frazier	McGill	Steiwer
Blaine	George	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Moses	Trammell
Capper	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Caraway	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Carey	Harrison	Norris	Wagner
Cohen	Hawes	Nye	Walcott
Connally	Hayden	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Copeland	Johnson	Pittman	Watson
Costigan	Jones	Reed	Wheeler
Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ark.	White
Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Dale	Keyes	Sheppard

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. HULL] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] are necessarily detained from the Senate attending the funeral of the late Representative Eslick.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senators from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON and Mr. BAILEY] are necessarily out of the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the naval appropriation bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendments, and that committee amendments be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 4738) to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, which had previously been signed by the Speaker pro tempore of the House.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE—REFUND TO PASQUALE MIRABELLI (S. DOC. NO. 110)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation, fiscal year 1932, for the Department of Labor, for a refund of $1,000 furnished as a bail bond to insure the departure of Vincenzo Mirabelli, an alien, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. JONES presented a resolution adopted by the University Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Seattle, Wash., opposing the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to the States, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bremerton and vicinity, in the State of Washington, praying for the passage of legislation providing a $5,000,000,000 bond issue to finance public improvements, so as to aid employment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented papers in the nature of petitions from 840 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented papers in the nature of memorials from 60 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE IN THE NORTHWEST

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask consent that a wire from the governor of my State relative to the grasshopper situation may be inserted in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 13, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please push grasshopper appropriation bill, passed by Senate. Secretary of Agriculture Hyde is in error, at least in so far as Minnesota is concerned, when he states that it is too late for the Federal Government to assist the farmers who will suffer terrible injury through the grasshopper plague. Ruggles, State entomologist, who is thoroughly familiar with the situation in Minnesota and in that part of North Dakota contiguous to Minnesota, advises that there is still time for Federal assistance.

FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I also ask consent to insert in the RECORD a clipping from the Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune of June 14 in reference to the Grasshopper Menace.

I also ask consent to print in the RECORD wires from the Litchfield Community Club, the St. Anthony Commercial Club, of Minneapolis, the Winona Association of Commerce, of Winona, and a letter from D. Handelan, of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, all of which refer to grasshoppers.

I ask that the matters referred to may lie on the table.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GRASSHOPPER MENACE

The Northwest to-day faces a possibility of disaster the like of which has no parallel in our history.

We have every prospect of the best grain and feed crop since 1924, and we have every prospect that our crops will be devoured by grasshoppers.

We have gone through the lean years of drought, partial failures, and grasshoppers. We have struggled through with the Red Cross feeding some 40,000 of our farmers last winter. The Government has been obliged to feed livestock and to loan money for seed. Over half the farmers in North Dakota borrowed money from the Government to buy seed for this spring's planting. All this we have lived through only to be confronted by a menace more far-reaching in its possibilities of devastation—the worst plague of grasshoppers ever known.

The Northwest simply can not survive another year like last. The Red Cross will not continue to feed our farmers indefinitely. The Government will not keep on loaning us money for seed forever. Another year such as last will bring bankruptcy to our merchants, more farm foreclosures, and failure to banks throughout the Northwest. Nicollet Avenue will feel the sharp pinch of poverty. Every man, woman, and child in the Northwest will find life harder, if 1931 is repeated—and it may not only be repeated but we may have woe piled on woe unless the grasshopper plague is checked in time.

We could check these billions of grasshoppers with poison bait, but there are no State funds available in amounts sufficient for our needs.

Minnesota has appropriated $100,000 and needs $150,000 more.

North Dakota needs $400,000.

South Dakota needs $500,000.

The Northwest hopefully waited for a poison-bait appropriation in the agricultural appropriation bill. Secretary Hyde told the House Committee on Appropriations Saturday that the time had passed and that the money could not be used. Unless Congress can be induced to make a special appropriation for this purpose, the Northwest will have to raise the money immediately.

The situation demands instant action. Officials must break through red tape and private organizations and individuals must come to the aid of the imperiled counties of the Northwest or the Northwest will have another year of depression worse than any we have had so far.

On another page are photographs showing what the grasshoppers have already done, and they have barely started. Other pictures show what they did last year. No one can look at these pictures without coming to the realization that we are face to face with a calamity of the first order.

Our salvation lies in poison bait. Poison bait we must have or we are ruined. We need $1,250,000 to save a billion dollars' worth of crops—$1 to save $1,000.

Even the farmers of the Northwest do not fully realize the seriousness of their peril. Those who have not had the experience can not realize the thoroughness of the destruction wrought by grasshoppers when they become a plague. The grasshoppers haven't grown their wings as yet. Once they start to fly they can spread over an entire State in a few days, leaving bare fields behind them, with hardly a blade or a stalk to show where there was once a bountiful stand of wheat, rye, barley, corn, hay, or pasture.

It is up to the business men of the Northwest to take instant hold of the situation if they want any business this fall. Turn to page 9 of this issue. Then bombard Congress with telegrams and in the meantime organize to raise the necessary funds if Congress doesn't act at once.

Otherwise the Northwest is headed for a year of disaster from which it will take us decades to recover. We haven't a day to lose. Already the work of destruction has begun. It will spread with cyclonic rapidity in a few days and then we will wring our hands to no avail.

Our crops and livestock will be gone and our farmers put on the dole; our stores, offices, and shops will be closed.

The Northwest will be a land of desolation and despair.

The Tribune takes no joy in the rôle of a prophet of evil; but the disaster that menaces the Northwest is so overwhelming that this responsibility can not be avoided.

LITCHFIELD, MINN., June 14, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL:

The farmers and business men of Meeker County request the Congress of the United States to take immediate action in appropriating funds for poison bait to fight the grasshopper menace, which threatens to attack us. We demand action at once.

LITCHFIELD COMMUNITY CLUB.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senate Office Building, Washington:

We are emphatically convinced beyond any question of doubt that immediate action for poison bait to combat grasshopper plague is necessary. There is time to overcome the great danger confronting us at this moment. Reports of this hopper menace are so convincing that delay might further endanger the finances of the whole country. Business will suffer if something is not accomplished at once. Feel that this is a national problem.

ST. ANTHONY COMMERCIAL CLUB, Minneapolis.

WINONA, MINN., June 15, 1932.

THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senate Chamber, Washington:

We earnestly urge your support legislation for grasshopper fight.

WINONA ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 14, 1932.

Senator THOMAS SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The ravaging grasshoppers are causing everyone in the Northwest grave concern, and we are writing to you direct asking that you do everything possible toward securing an immediate appropriation from Congress for destroying this rapidly multiplying pest. At the present time every other issue, including the prohibition plank, is secondary.

Already the fields in some sections of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota have been stripped of all vegetation, and this is only a small portion of the millions of dollars' which will be lost unless the grasshoppers can be poisoned at once.

In spite of Mr. Hyde's announcement, authorities in the Northwest are of the opinion that there is yet time to save the crops, but action must be taken immediately. By appropriating one dollar now thousands can be saved within the next few weeks.

The Government will be forced to feed thousands of people not only on the farms but in the cities as well if the advance of the grasshopper is not checked immediately.

This is an urgent request sent to you hoping that you will do everything in your power to have this bill passed within the next few days.

Yours very truly,

HANDELAN WASHED AIR CO.,
By D. HANDELAN.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2824) to amend the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia creating the office of steam-boiler inspector for the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 833) thereon.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM—AMENDMENTS

Mr. JONES, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. ASHURST each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

TARIFF COMMISSION REPORT—PINS

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 238), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate, for the purpose of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930, the differences in cost of production between the domestic article or articles and competitive foreign article or articles; and to report at the earliest practical date on the following items:

All pins, classified under paragraph 350 of the tariff act of 1930.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on June 15, 1932, the President approved and signed the act (S. 4689) to authorize the closing of certain streets in the District of Columbia rendered useless or unnecessary, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

REPORT OF RADIO COMMISSION ON SENATE RESOLUTION 129

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an analysis of the report of the Radio Commission to the Senate in response to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], together with certain excerpts from the report.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Broadcasting for June 15, 1932]

LIMIT ON ADVERTISING CALLED DANGEROUS—COMMISSION URGES SELF-REGULATION IN COUZENS-DILL REPORT—ONLY 6½ PER CENT OF TIME ON AIR DEVOTED TO SALES TALK

By Sol Taishoff

A report that unequivocally favors commercial broadcasting, without further governmental interference, was submitted to the Senate June 9 by the Radio Commission, in compliance with the Couzens-Dill resolution (S. Res. 129) adopted last January. The 325-page volume, exclusive of exhibits, is based on a 6-month investigation of all phases of the broadcasting industry, with particular stress on advertising. It is submitted to serve as the basis for whatever legislation Congress may deem necessary to ameliorate the alleged "advertising evil."

While the report is devoid of recommendations as such, it is honeycombed with statements, analyses, and deductions, based on replies to questionnaires sent to stations, advertising agencies, radio advertisers, foreign radio groups, and others, which show the utter impracticability of attempting to limit, restrict, or curtail advertising by legislation or even through governmental regulation. A Government owned or controlled system, suggested in the Senate resolution, appears to be economically impossible if service standards are to be maintained.

"Any plan, the purpose of which is to eliminate the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes, will if adopted destroy the present system of broadcasting," the commission said in replying to the most important of the 15 questions propounded in the resolution. The question asked what plans might be adopted to reduce, to limit, to control, and, perhaps, to eliminate the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes.

TWO DISSENTERS

In the letter of transmittal the commission explained that Chairman Saltzman and Commissioner Lafount dissented from the majority view that additional legislation is necessary to enable the commission to limit and control the amount of time used for commercial-advertising purposes. They held that the radio act of 1927, under section 4, gives such power to the commission.

In every instance the commission supported its conclusions by evidence procured from the industry and its affiliated pursuits. Letters from executives of 52 leading advertising agencies handling radio accounts were included in the report. These unanimously objected to congressional tampering with broadcast advertising and predicted that broadcasting would deteriorate in every department, through loss of 75 to 90 per cent of the commercial accounts on the air, if advertising credits were limited to mere mention of the sponsor's name or otherwise restricted.

Allegations of excessive sales talks seem to be effectively exploded by the report. An analysis, covering a "typical broadcast week," showed that only 6.55 per cent of the total hours used by 582 reporting stations of the 607 then on the air were devoted to sales talks or descriptions of the commodity advertised. It showed also that slightly more than one-third of the total number of hours used by the same stations was devoted to commercial programs, with the remainder of a sustaining or noncommercial character. Sales talks consumed 18.11 per cent of the hours devoted to commercial programs.

Sales talks and related matters consumed 11.27 per cent of the commercial programs of network stations, as compared to 20.03 per cent of the commercial programs of local stations, the report showed.

"A flat restriction placed upon the amount of time used for sales talks, without regard to the location, power, and activities of stations, would in all probability work inequitable results," the commission declared. "Moreover, and in any case or class, limitations upon the use of time for commercial advertising, if too severe, would result in a loss of advertising revenue to stations, which, in all probability, would be reflected in a reduction in the quantity and quality of programs available to the public * * *.

"It would not appear to be practicable and satisfactory at the present time and in the ordinary case to permit only the announcement of sponsorship of programs by persons or corporations."

The commission suggested the situation should have its cure within itself, following in that regard the recommendations consistently made by the industry and by advertising agencies. It said that competition between advertisers insures the use of the best talent available and variety in commercial programs. Unless broadcasters correct their own mistakes, the report said, they will lose their means of support anyway.

Throughout the report the commission emphasized that if Congress considered remedial legislation on advertising necessary, it should vest those powers in the commission rather than undertake to place directly in the law any such restrictions. "We conceive," the report said, "it to be advisable to enact such legislation as will permit the commission to impose such regulations as the circumstances from time to time seem to warrant, rather than legislation imposing specific restrictions and unflexible limitations."

VIEWPOINT OF AGENCIES

From advertising agencies handling radio accounts came general criticism of any attempt to regulate or limit advertising and expressions of confidence in the ability of radio to solve its own problems. As an advertising force, radio was commended. Objectionable sales talks in programs were said to be very largely the fault of the advertiser, rather than that of the station or agency. Any limitation, some said, would be wholly contrary to the spirit of American competition and would immediately paralyze the industry. Finally, it was asserted that the amount of sales talk is a matter of good taste and good business judgment, and neither could be brought about by law. A survey of the views of the agencies is presented on other pages in this issue.

As an encyclopedia on broadcasting the report is invaluable. For the first time detailed figures covering profits, losses, investments, and other fiscal data of stations and networks are given. Types of programs in every class of station are broken down for varying representative periods. Card rates of stations, methods of computing rates and other charges, and the manner in which the business of broadcasting functions are detailed from the standpoints of advertiser, agency, station, and the public. Foreign broadcasting is covered fully and authentically.

INVESTMENT FIGURES

Actual investments in 571 stations and the major networks, as of December 31, 1931, in broadcasting stations, totaled approximately $48,000,000. During the same year gross receipts of these stations amounted to $77,758,048.79 and gross expenditures to $77,995,405.68, which included $20,159,656.07 for talent and programs, $16,884,436.91 for regular employees, $4,725,168.23 for equipment, and $36,226,144.47 for miscellaneous items.

Last year 333 stations reported profits aggregating $5,451,717.05, varying from $13.94 to $376,279 for particular stations. Losses were reported by 180 stations, aggregating $2,200,743.76 and varying from $22.50 to $178,535.72 in the case of a company operating two stations.

EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTING

The last eight questions in the resolution, and the final half of the report, related to educational broadcasting, to purported monopoly of stations by particular groups, and to alleged discrimination against educational stations by the commission. In these replies, the commission analyzed the allocations to and services of the networks.

The final question asked was whether the commission believed that educational programs can be safely left to periods donated by commercial stations—a question prompted by the demand of certain educational factions for 15 per cent of all waves to be devoted to education. The commission replied:

"The present attitude of broadcasters, as indicated herein, justifies the belief that educational programs can be safely left to the voluntary gift of the use of commercial stations." It supported this by statistics from 533 stations, which showed they had offered their facilities liberally to local schools and colleges.

The inquiry on which the report was based was directed by James W. Baldwin, commission secretary, head of a special staff which devoted full time to the task. For the last two months the commission has been studying the report, paragraph by paragraph, before submitting it to the Senate.

THE REPORT

In a preliminary statement the commission explained that the report is based upon information gathered from all known authentic sources. The bulk of it was based on replies to a questionnaire addressed to all stations covering the typical broadcast week from November 8 to 14, inclusive, 1931. This period was selected with the view of collecting data for a period of time which was previous to the latest public discussions on the questions contained in the resolution.

Additional information was procured from a separate questionnaire to companies engaged in chain broadcasting, which required submission of information covering the calendar year 1931; from an interrogatory letter addressed to the Secretary of State concerning the broadcasting systems in certain foreign countries; from a like letter addressed to others, including the Secretary of Commerce and the International Broadcasting Union at Geneva; from questionnaires to advertising agencies, radio advertisers, and educational organizations identified with radio; and from the commission records.

Questionnaires were mailed to 607 stations and replies were received from 583 that could be used.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP

In response to the first question of the resolution, asking what information there is available on the feasibility of Government ownership and operation, the commission broke down its answer into three separate statements. The first, dealing with information concerning the feasibility of a governmentally owned and operated system in the United States, emphasized the utter futility of attempting to apply the so-called European plan to this country. The second statement dealt with systems in foreign countries, and the third with information concerning the system now in use in this country.

Following is the commissions statement concerning a Government system in this country:

"There has been no governmentally owned broadcasting system in North America, and consequently any information concerning such operation must come from the experiences of certain European nations * * *.

"Conditions in Europe and in the United States are entirely different. In Europe there are a large number of sovereign nations in a relatively small area, with different languages, different customs, and different political interests. The United States is a single Nation in which the population is distributed over a large area. To apply results obtained in any European country to the United States would probably lead one to entirely wrong conclusions.

"There are many possible broadcasting systems which could be operated in the United States under Government control, but the determination of a proper technical system depends on the aim to be accomplished. The United States is made up of 48 political subdivisions having varying areas, populations, and interests. The policy adopted might take into account the particular interests of the people of the various States with the selection of programs in the control of each State, or all stations could be nationally owned and operated with the selection of all programs in the control of a national organization.

"Each policy requires a different system of technical operation, and it is not possible to formulate a definite plan of technical operation without a determination of policy. For example, it might be decided that each person in the United States, no matter where located, is entitled to receive the same number of programs, each with a satisfactory signal free of interference. Such a service might be accomplished by means of a large number of low-power stations operated in several synchronized chains.

"It is estimated that such a system would require approximately 1,000 stations for each program. To supply three programs would require an initial cost for installation of approximately $120,000,000 with an annual technical maintenance of approximately $100,000,000. (These cost figures do not include cost of talent.)

"Another possible policy might be to give two or more national programs which could be heard at night throughout the United States and provide one or more stations to be operated independently by each State to give programs of interest to the States. The national coverage could be provided by several high-power stations geographically arranged so as to give a satisfactory rural service. The State stations would vary in power depending on the area of the State to be served. To give such a service would require an initial investment of approximately $50,000,000 with an annual technical maintenance of approximately the same amount. (These cost figures do not include cost of talent.)

"These two plans are simply examples which have been developed to show the possibilities and to give some idea of cost. There are many other plans that could be conceived, each of which would serve a certain purpose and fulfill a particular policy. Without the policy, however, complete studies can not be made and cost figures can not be estimated accurately.

"The present system of competitive operation of broadcast stations by private enterprise has grown up under the policy laid down by Congress in the radio act of 1927. Under this system all the people of the United States get some form of radiobroadcast service. If this policy is to be changed, then a thorough investigation of all the various possible methods of serving the people of the United States should be made and a policy determined which would be satisfactory.

"The Federal Radio Commission is ready to prepare detailed plans for a technical arrangement to meet the needs of any policy which may be determined if it should be decided that Government ownership and operation of broadcasting is desirable for the United States."

The second phase of the government-ownership statement, covering foreign systems, was in the nature of a chronological history of their activities. Because practically the same information has been given in previous issues of Broadcasting, there is no need for its repetition here. The nations covered are Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Mexico, Russia, and Spain. The report discloses that, despite the fact that most of these nations have government control in some way or other, commercial programs are coming to be more and more in evidence.

UNITED STATES BROADCASTING TO-DAY

In the third section of the government-ownership statement, the commission reviews broadcasting in the United States. "Radio broadcasting in the United States," it says, "has grown to be a very large industry. This industry engages 607 stations located geographically so as to insure consistent radio reception at night over about 46 per cent (56.2 per cent daytime) of the total area of the continental United States and to about 89.6 per cent (94 per cent daytime) of its total population. The entire area and total population of the United States receive intermittent service at night."

The commission explained that the industry exists by virtue of licenses granted by the Government for certain periods (usually six months) to operate radio stations in the public interest, and that it subsists solely upon the revenue derived from the sale of "broadcast time" for commercial advertising. All but about 40 of the stations are privately owned and privately operated, it explained. The exceptions are stations that are either directly or indirectly owned by States and municipalities.

Stations were broken down into their power and channel classifications as follows: 237 locals, employing six frequencies; 272 low-power regionals, employing 40 frequencies; 8 high-power regionals, employing 4 frequencies; and 90 clear-channel stations, employing 40 frequencies. Of the 607 stations, 389 were authorized to operate simultaneously at nighttime as of December 31, 1931.

After describing the difference between commercial and sustaining features, the commission explained that what is contained in sustaining programs depends almost entirely upon the extent to which radio facilities are used for commercial advertising. The revenue thus derived must pay all the costs, including generally all sustaining programs, it brought out.

"Of the total hours used by 582 stations during the period of the survey, 63.86 per cent was used for sustaining programs and 36.14 per cent was used for commercial programs," the report declared.

"Both commercial and sustaining programs contain much that is of an informational and educational character. Of the total hours used by 582 stations during the period of the survey, 12.62 per cent was used to broadcast educational programs, of which 80.04 per cent was contained in sustaining programs (58.42 per cent local and 21.62 per cent chain) and 19.96 per cent was contained in commercial programs (10.33 per cent local and 9.63 per cent chain) * * *.

"The acceptance, by stations, of their opportunities and responsibilities in matters of local interest is favorably reflected in the analysis, which shows, in this regard, that of the 43,055 hours used by 582 stations, 32,922 hours (76.46 per cent) were used to broadcast programs originated locally, and that of these, 20,765 hours (63.07 per cent) represent local sustaining programs. These broadcasts are an important factor in the American system of broadcasting."

CHAIN BROADCASTING

Apropos chain broadcasting, the report said that of the 582 stations that submitted reports, 187 during the period of the survey were affiliated with networks. "By affiliation with chain companies," it added, "stations procure program material of national as well as local interest. Also this relation enables the station to present programs constructed by use of the best talent available in the large metropolitan centers and generally at the same time to accept or reject chain material according to choice."

The report explained that National Broadcasting Co. and Columbia Broadcasting System are the largest companies in the network field and gave detailed information concerning the number of stations owned, financed, leased, or operated; the number of affiliate stations; classification and distribution of programs; and other detailed information concerning their activities.

The commission took up the subject of rates in detail, stating that it regarded rates as having a general bearing on certain of the questions contained in the resolution. Based on returns from 583 stations that furnished such information, it said that 521 stations, or about 90 per cent, quote rates for paid broadcasts and that the practice is reported in every class of station.

For example, 13 of the 44 educational stations sell time, as do 7 of the 12 State or municipal stations, 5 of the 28 religious stations, both of the fraternal stations, the single labor station, and the single socialist station. Of the 495 stations listed as general, 493 reported rates.

The aggregate number of rate figures and combinations for all stations is very large, but some comparison between stations may be had for any suitable element. Thus, of 521 stations that quote rates, 445 quote rates for a single quarter-hour day program. These rates for daytime average about $28 but vary between several dollars and several hundred.

National rates average about 50 per cent above local rates, but substantial departures from average is the rule rather than the exception. The variations range from 10 to 200 per cent.

STATION CARD RATES

In a compilation based on rate returns from nearly all stations the commission showed rate variation by station powers and by the five radio zones. The figures are for 1-time use of a quarter hour at night, with the national rate used for stations quoting dual rates on stations. Over 5,000 watts, the quarter-hour night rate average is $172.95; stations of 5,000 watts, $99.28; over 1,000 but under 5,000 watts, $80; 1,000 watts, $56.37; 500 watts, $44.11; over 100 but under 500 watts, $34.02; 100 watts, $18.80; and under 100 watts, $15.32.

The commission emphasized that these figures are mere averages of quoted rates, not weighted means. It added that the fact that national rates are used for stations reporting national and local rates is not significant, since less than one-fourth of the stations report such dual rates.

In general, it was brought out higher station rates go with higher station power, but the relation is irregular and by no means proportional. As among the radio zones, the rates average lower in the third and fifth than in the other three, this being attributed by the commission to the lower density of receiving sets in the southern and western sections, as well as to sparse populations.

The report also contains a detailed discussion of network rates, covering basic networks as well as the supplementary groups. Discounts, extras, invoice items, and other auxiliary features of the fiscal side of network operations are described at length.

How land lines are used in broadcasting is outlined by the commission. These lines, or program circuits, it explained, are procured by lease, principally from American Telephone & Telegraph. During 1931 American Telephone & Telegraph furnished such circuits measuring more than 44,000 miles, actually about 90,000 miles of wire, to 12 radio networks. Of this total, 32,500 circuit miles were furnished to 7 permanent networks operating 16 consecutive hours daily, 6,500 circuit miles to temporary networks for service on temporary recurring periods, 5,000 circuit miles to permanent networks for special programs.

NET-STATION AGREEMENTS

Practices of the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting System in fixing charges with affiliated stations are not uniform, but both companies use a system of debits and credits, the commission brought out. The National Broadcasting Co. quotes flat rates on an hourly basis which are net to station; all costs of production, wire-line charges, and overhead expenses of every nature are borne by the National Broadcasting Co. regardless of the classification into which a particular program falls.

In the case of the Columbia Broadcasting System, payments to affiliate stations are based on a number of factors. The company pays line costs for the stations on its basic network and the stations give the first two, three, or four commercial hours per week without cost to the Columbia Broadcasting System to compensate for line service. Stations not on the Columbia Broadcasting System basic net bear a larger proportion of the line cost by giving the same or more free hours per week. From certain stations not on the basic net which can not afford cash outlay for line expense, the Columbia Broadcasting System gets as much as eight free hours and assumes the risk of using the commercial time.

For time between 6 p. m. and midnight the National Broadcasting Co. pays affiliate stations $50 per hour and for others hours $30 for carrying its chain commercials. The Columbia Broadcasting System pays at a rate arrived at by considering the size and importance of the market served and the demand for coverage in that market by national sponsors of programs. There is, therefore, a wide spread in rates. The normal rate is reported to be $50 an hour, with a few important stations receiving two or three times this amount.

The National Broadcasting Co. collects from affiliate stations for sustaining features at the rate of $25 per hour between 6 p. m. and midnight and $15 for all other hours, but bears the total cost of production, including line charges. The Columbia Broadcasting System gives its sustaining features without cost but in consideration therefor the stations bear part or all of the line charges. Institutional programs are offered by the National Broadcasting Co. on a no-charge basis.

ADVERTISING ON THE AIR

Slightly more than one-third of the total hours used by the 582 stations which furnished satisfactory reports for the typical week covered by the survey were used for commercial programs, the commission brought out in answer to question 2 of the Senate resolution. This question asked: "To what extent the facilities of a representative group of broadcasting stations are used for commercial advertising purposes?"

The commission explained that, in all, these stations were on the air for 43,055 hours during the year. Of this total, 27,493 hours (63.86 per cent) represented sustaining programs, and 15,561 hours (36.14 per cent) represented commercial programs. Of the total number of hours used to broadcast commercial programs, 78.12 per cent were local and 21.88 per cent network. Of the total number of hours used for sustaining programs, 75.53 per cent were local and 24.47 per cent network.

Of the total number of hours the stations were on the air, 43,055 (about 68 per cent) were used between 6 a. m. and 6 p. m., and about 32 per cent between 6 p. m. and midnight. Of the 29,356 hours used between 6 a. m. and 6 p. m., 48.77 per cent were local sustaining and 16.96 per cent network sustaining; 29.57 per cent were local commercial and 4.70 per cent network commercial.

Of the 13,698 hours 19 minutes used between 6 p. m. and 12 midnight, 47.08 per cent were local sustaining and 12.77 per cent network sustaining; 25.37 per cent were local commercial and 14.78 per cent network commercial.

"Sales talks or a description of the commodity advertised, etc.," said the commission, "consumed 2,819 hours 7 minutes. This represents 6.55 per cent of the total hours used for both sustaining and commercial programs and 18.11 per cent of the hours devoted only to commercial programs."

In the two tables that follow are shown, first, the percentage of time devoted to sales talks, etc., as related to all the broadcast hours for local programs and chain programs separately and for daytime and nighttime as to each; second, the same information as it relates to the hours devoted only to commercial programs:

Table showing percentage of hours and minutes devoted to sales talks, etc., as related to the total sustaining and commercial hours for local programs and chain programs, separately and for daytime and nighttime as to each

STATION VARIATIONS

In response to the question: "To what extent the use of radio facilities for purposes of commercial advertising varies as between stations having power of 100, 500, 1,000, 5,000, and all in excess of 5,000 watts," the commission submitted a detailed compilation based on reports from representative stations in the various categories. By analyzing reports of 201 stations in the 100-watt class, it said they devote 6.58 per cent of their total hours and 19.01 per cent of their commercial hours to sales talks. The 125 stations of 500 watts devoted 6.85 per cent of their total hours, and 19.41 per cent of commercial hours to sales talks. The 99 stations of 1,000 watts devoted 6.41 per cent of total hours and 16.30 per cent of commercial hours to sales talks. The 33 stations of 5,000 watts devoted 4.56 per cent of total hours, and 14.60 per cent of commercial hours to sales talks. The 32 stations using powers in excess of 5,000 watts used 5.96 per cent of their total hours, and 13.86 per cent of their commercial hours for sales talks.

ADVERTISING CONTROL

The crux of the commission's report came in reply to question 4 of the Couzens-Dill resolution, which reads: "What plans might be adopted to reduce, to limit, to control, and perhaps to eliminate the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes?"

"This answer," said the commission, "is based upon the premise that the present system of broadcasting will be retained. Any plan, the purpose of which is to eliminate the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes, will, if adopted, destroy the present system of broadcasting.

"Any plan to reduce, limit, and control the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes to a specific amount or time or to a certain per cent of the total time utilized by the station, must have its inception in new and additional legislation which either fixes and prescribes such limitations or specifically authorizes the commission to do so under a general standard prescribed by that legislation. While the commission may, under the existing law, refuse to renew a license to broadcast or revoke such license because the character of program material does not comply with the statutory standard of public interest, convenience, and necessity, there is at present no limitation upon the use of radio facilities for advertising.

"Such regulation, whether specifically undertaken by Congress or delegated by it to the commission, could extend both to the quality and the quantity of commercial advertising. While the quality of advertising might and probably would be difficult of adequate regulation, the quantity of such advertising could be limited to certain hours in the day or night and to a certain number of such hours; also, a provision could be made limiting advertising matter to a certain per cent of the time devoted to total programs or commercial programs.

"Any such system of regulation should, however, recognize and apply the differences in the needs and requirements of stations of the several classes; that is, clear, regional, and local. Also, a basis for classification may exist in the fact that certain programs are originated locally for local consumption, whereas others are originated by chain companies for the edification and entertainment of the country as an entirety or at least for very large sections thereof.

"Thus, it will be observed from the matter collected in this report that while sales talks, etc., consumed 6.55 per cent of the total hours used during the sample week by the 582 stations of all classes and that such matters consumed 18.11 per cent of the total commercial hours of such stations, sales talks and related matters consumed only 11.27 per cent of the commercial programs of chain stations as compared to 20.03 per cent of commercial programs of local stations.

"A flat restriction placed upon the amount of time used for sales talks without regard to the location, power, and activities of stations, would, in all probability, work inequitable results. Moreover, and in any case or class, limitations upon the use of time for commercial advertising, if too severe, would result in a loss of revenue to stations which, in all probability, would be reflected in a reduction in the quantity and quality of programs available to the public.

"The radio act of 1927 was obviously designed to permit the licensees of broadcasting stations the maximum of latitude in the matter of program material. Such licensees are in a singularly favorable position to learn what the audience wants to hear and to make the necessary changes in program material and in methods of presentation that will cause their programs to be favorably received by a substantial majority of the listeners.

"The adoption of regulations of the sort herein described should be undertaken only when it clearly appears that a majority or at least a considerable number of the licensees have failed to operate their stations in a manner acceptable to a majority of the listening public. If, in the opinion of Congress, that time has now arrived, we conceive it to be advisable to enact such legislation as will permit the commission to impose such regulations as the circumstances from time to time seem to warrant rather than legislation imposing specific restrictions and unflexible limitations."

WHAT IS DONE ABROAD

Question 5 of the resolution asked, "What rules or regulations have been adopted by other countries to control or to eliminate the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes?"

"Broadcasting systems in foreign countries that are supported entirely by revenue derived by a tax or license fee for receiver-set ownership or by government subsidy, do not, as a rule, accept commercial advertising, whereas stations owned and operated by private interests are supported mainly from advertisements and subsidies paid voluntarily by the listening public," the commission replied.

"Ten of the thirteen foreign countries that were investigated permit commercial advertising and with one exception, have laws, rules, or regulations governing such advertising. Austria, England, and Russia prohibit commercial advertising."

ANNOUNCEMENT LIMITS

To question 6, inquiring whether it would be practicable and satisfactory to permit only the announcement of sponsorship of programs by persons or corporations, the commission answered in the negative.

"It will not appear to be practicable and satisfactory at the present time, and in the ordinary case, to permit only the announcement of sponsorship of programs by persons or corporations," the reply stated.

"Information made available to the commission shows that sponsorship of programs simply by name would amount, in the ordinary case, only to good-will advertising. A few products and their uses may be so well and generally known as to permit this. On the other hand, and as to the majority of products, such advertising would involve an expense which national advertisers are not now willing and in a position to bear.

"Many products have several uses which must be described to be understood and appreciated. New products frequently need to be explained. Nearly every manufacturer seeks to develop concerning his product special characteristics which set it off from competing products and make it more desirable. Identity of product, description of uses, and characteristics must be woven into and become a part of the program to make it of value to the sponsor. What applies to the national advertiser, applies in even greater degree to the local advertiser. In such cases, identity by name only would be of little value to the advertiser.

"It should be borne in mind that if a restriction permitting sponsorship by name only should cause a number of advertisers to discontinue the use of radio facilities as a medium for commercial advertising, such nonuse would immediately and inevitably be reflected in a decrease both in the quantity and quality of programs available to the public. A serious loss in revenue to the stations could, under our system of broadcasting, have no other result.

BROADCASTERS HAVE CURE

"As a matter of fact, the situation should have its own cure within itself. There should be a keener appreciation by both the broadcaster and the advertiser that radio facilities not only offer perhaps the greatest opportunity for reaching the greatest number of people but that their use imposes upon them a very great responsibility for the manner in which programs are presented. By the use of these facilities the advertiser is permitted by the licensee of a radio station to visit in the homes of the listening audience. The value of his contact is dependent upon the amount of sales talk and the kind of entertainment he offers as well as the manner in which he chooses to express himself. Those whom he offends can promptly eject him and deny him further admission.

"The broadcaster and the advertiser who fail to recognize such fundamental principles and to make the adjustments in the content and method of presentation of programs desired by a great number of the listening public must suffer the natural consequences resulting from the operation of the law of economics.

"The employment of national surveys of program and station popularity, better showmanship and tact by advertisers, and a strict supervision on contents of all programs by the licensees of stations should develop a technique that would be more satisfactory to the listening public and beneficial to the industry.

"Here, as in our answer to the fourth question, if it is the opinion of Congress that the situation justifies further and additional legislation, the proper solution would seem to lie in legislation authorizing the commission to enact certain regulations designed to govern the situation rather than specific legislation on the subject by Congress."

The commission explained that, in an effort to obtain information upon this subject, it addressed a questionnaire to the advertising agencies which purchase time from the two major chain companies. The answers were unanimous in the view that mere sponsorship announcement would not be practicable, nor even in the public interest.

STATION INVESTMENTS

A balance sheet for broadcasting was produced by the commission in reply to the seventh question: "Any information available concerning the investments and the net income of a number of representative broadcasting companies or stations." It explained that sworn statements bearing on these subjects were obtained for the great majority of the existing stations and chains in general covering the year 1931. It emphasized that in considering these figures there should be kept in mind the wide diversity in the character of stations and licensees. Difficulty was encountered in segregating accounts of numerous stations operated by schools, churches, and other institutions, as well as individuals and corporations engaged primarily in other business than broadcasting.

"Inquiry was made regarding the capital authorized in corporate charters," the report said. "In numerous cases of corporations engaged in varied activities there is no separate figure peculiar to radio. In many other cases no par value is assigned to stock, and this is true of the largest chain companies. The figures reported for 282 stations, about 46 per cent of all, range from $1,000 to $750,000 and average from about $200,000 for a 50,000-watt station to $15,000 for a 10-watt station.

"Such figures have very limited significance. They may represent some ideas of capital requirements, but such ideas may be expected to change substantially with time, and at any one time to differ substantially as between different licensees, locations, and other station characteristics besides power. There are doubtless instances of write-ups and write-downs or like effect where a station has changed hands at a price representing a marked change in capital set-up. No effort was made to obtain figures of stock authorized and unsold, nor of prices, commissions, discounts, or premiums attending sales, nor generally to trace the history of capital-stock accounts. Instead independent figures of actually invested capital were obtained."

Using figures from 558 stations, the commission found a total investment of $36,845,045.94. These it broke down into power groups, with total invested capital and approximate average investment. The approximate average for the entire group of 558 stations was $66,000.

In the various groups: 33 stations under 100 watts reported invested capital of $288,202.05 for an approximate average per station of $8,700.

One hundred and ninety-one stations of 100 watts reported invested capital of $107,502.18 for an average of $21,500

Fifty-four stations of over 100 and under 500 watts reported invested capital of $2,396,354.37 for an average of $44,400.

One hundred and twenty-three stations of 500 watts reported invested capital of $6,659,645.49 for an average of $54,100.

One station of 750 watts reported invested capital of $20,500.

Ninety-five stations of 1,000 watts reported invested capital of $9,889,802.17 for an average of $104,100.

Four stations of over 1,000 watts and under 5,000 watts reported invested capital of $200,455.56 for an average of $50,100.

Thirty-one stations of 5,000 watts reported an invested capital of $5,221,464.78 for an average of $16,400.

Twenty-six stations of more than 5,000 watts reported invested capital of $8,061,119.34 for an average of $310,000.

These figures, the commission said, covered about 92 per cent of all stations, including the great majority of those affiliated with chains; but those missing include some of high power and chain ownership. These data, also, do not cover the investments reported by the chain companies.

VALUES OF PLANTS

The technical equipment, generators, transmitters, antennæ, etc., reported separately for 570 stations, were appraised at $35,400,137.22. The average ranged from $6,300 for stations under 100 watts to $168,700 for those of 5 kilowatts and over. Total physical assets were reported to value $30,578,680.51 by 573 stations. Of this number, 571 reported technical equipment valued at $20,196,137.22, or 66 per cent of the total; 249 reported real estate valued at $5,856,906.08, or 19 per cent of the total; and 545 reported furniture and fixtures valued at $4,525,637.01, or 15 per cent of the total.

Good will is estimated at $5,000,000 by one municipal licensee, and for 299 other stations at amounts from $300,000 down to $100, while reports for 276 others indicate that the item is carried in their accounts at a purely nominal figure, such as $1, or omitted entirely. The figures reported for the item of good will aggregate $18,254,215.51, which added to the values of physical assets gives a total of $48,642,895.82 for the same 573 stations, plus 3 that report good will only, or an average, roughly, 30 per cent greater than that of investment.

BROADCASTERS' INCOMES

Receipts, expenditures, and profit or loss during 1931 were likewise made the subject of inquiry. Gross receipts reported for individual stations varied from a few hundred dollars to over $1,500,000, aggregating $38,461,302.41 for 525 stations. Gross advertising revenue was reported for chain companies as follows: N. B. C., $25,895,959.34; C. B. S., $11,621,424.31; Don Lee (Inc.) (Pacific coast), $999,832.79; and Yankee Network, $779,529.94.

"The receipts thus reported for single stations plus gross advertising revenue reported by chain companies are together $77,758,048.79. * * *

"In general, all the foregoing figures for receipts are limited to commercial accounts, excluding advances from State appropriations, city funds, etc. Thus zero receipts are indicated for 44 stations. On the other hand, a number of stations are not accounted for in any of the foregoing, but these are less than 6 per cent of all stations in number."

The figures available indicate aggregate expenditures of $37,354,082.68 for 571 stations, while for 2 others at educational institutions all activity was cared for without any direct expenditure allocated to radio.

"For the individual stations," the commission added, "separate statements were obtained of profit or loss, to be computed without counting depreciation as an expense. Profits thus computed were reported for 333 stations, aggregating $5,451,717.05 and varying from $13.94 to $376,279 for particular stations. Losses similarly computed were reported for 180 stations, aggregating $2,200,743.76 and varying from $22.50 up to $178,535.72 in the case of a company operating two stations. A balance without profit or loss was reported by three stations, while no figures were given for 53 other reported stations of nonprofit character, and no report was made for 38 stations, or less than 7 per cent of all."

EDUCATION BY RADIO

The remainder of the report was devoted to answers to questions propounded by Senator DILL on educational broadcasting and the whole history of commission allocations having to do with educational stations. The effect of these questions and answers was to show that the number of educational stations dropped from 95 in 1927 to 44 as of January 1, 1932, mainly because of lack of public demand and because they were unable to compete with the more popular programs of commercial stations. Licenses of 23 of these stations voluntarily were assigned by the educational institutions to commercial enterprises; 18 were deleted by reason of voluntary abandonment; and 10 were deleted for cause.

In response to the question, "How many quota units are assigned to the N. B. C. and other stations it uses?" the commission replied that there were charged to stations owned, controlled, and operated by N. B. C. 44.27 units, and to the other stations it was using 140.63 units, a total of 184.90 units. During the period covered by the survey there were charged to stations owned, controlled, and operated by C. B. S. 29.07 units, and to the other stations it was using 8.03 units, a total of 114.10 units. There are approximately 435 units in the whole broadcasting system, one unit being the equivalent of one full-time 1,000-watt station.

To the third phase of the question, as to how many quota units are assigned to stations under control of educational institutions, the commission replied that during the period covered by the survey there were charged to stations under control of educational institutions 24.14 units, of which 18.33 units were charged to publicly controlled educational institutions and 5.81 units to privately controlled educational institutions.

To the question, "To what extent are commercial stations allowed free use of their facilities for broadcasting programs for use in schools and public institutions?" the commission's analysis showed that appreciably more time is so devoted than was expected.

Of 533 stations that submitted reports, exclusive of educational stations, 521 (97.75 per cent) reported they had offered their facilities to local educational institutions and only 12 (2.25 per cent) reported they had not. Of the 521, 444 (85.22 per cent) reported their facilities were offered free; 21 (4.03 per cent) reported their facilities were offered free, except for remote-control charges; 38 (7.29 per cent) reported a free offer, but that they specified the programs must be meritorious, of high quality, and in the public interest.

Absolute faith in commercial broadcasting and its ability to handle educational radio was expressed by the commission in reply to the final question: "Does the commission believe that educational programs can be safely left to the voluntary gift of the use of facilities by commercial stations?"

"The present attitude of broadcasters, as indicated herein," the commission said, "justifies the belief that educational programs can be safely left to the voluntary gift of the use of commercial stations." The commission backed this by pointing out that of 533 stations that answered the question whether they had offered their facilities to local schools, colleges, and universities, 521, or 97.75 per cent, answered "yes"; and 12, or 2.25 per cent, answered "no."

WHAT IS A COMMERCIAL PROGRAM?

Here is the Radio Commission's interpretation of a commercial program, as contained in its report to Congress on the Couzens-Dill resolution:

"A commercial program is a program presented by the station for profit. It is sponsored usually by a person or corporation engaged in either wholesale or retail or merchandise with a view of gaining the good will of listeners and of making direct sales. The program content usually consists of either orchestra, song, drama, symphony, opera, or variety, interspersed with sales talks or a description of the commodity advertised."

The commission describes a sustaining program as follows:

"A sustaining program is a program presented by the station without compensation and at its expense. Its purpose is twofold: (1) It serves as one method whereby the station can qualify under the public-interest clause contained in its license, and (2) it serves as a method by which the station seeks to enlarge and hold its audience and thereby increase the value of time available for commercial programs. The program content usually consists of either orchestra, song, drama, symphony, opera, variety, literature, science, politics, news, sports, or special events."

GOVERNMENT RADIO?

To provide the United States with a Government broadcasting system, even remotely comparable to the existing system, would mean an outlay during the first year of around $220,000,000, exclusive of talent and program costs, it is estimated in the Radio Commission's Couzens-Dill resolution report. To set up a large number of local stations on several synchronized chains would require about 1,000 stations for each program, and to supply three programs would require an initial cost for installation of approximately $120,000,000, with an annual technical maintenance of about $100,000,000. No estimate is made of talent costs.

These figures of chain expenditures, like those of chain investments and receipts, include a number of high-power stations not represented in the aggregate expenditures previously referred to as for individual stations. Some stations are missing from both sets of figures; these, however, are less than 5 per cent of all stations in number and are mainly in the lower-power groups.

RADIO BALANCE SHEET

Actual investments in 571 of the 607 broadcasting stations in this country as of December 31, 1931, totaled about $48,000,000, according to the Radio Commission's report on the Couzens-Dill resolution. During the same year, gross receipts of these stations amounted to $77,758,048.79, and gross expenditures to $77,995,405.68—the industry actually showing an unfavorable balance. Gross expenditures included $20,159,656.07 for talent and programs, $16,884,436.91 for regular employees, $4,725,168.23 for equipment, and $36,226,144.47 for miscellaneous expenditures.

SENATOR FROM NEW JERSEY

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief on a resolution pending before the Judiciary Committee touching the appointment of Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR as a Senator from the State of New Jersey. I do this because it has been requested. There will be no action by the committee at this session, I understand, but probably there will be at the December session.

There being no objection, the brief was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

STATEMENT OF QUESTION

The resolution involves the determination of a constitutional question affecting the validity of the appointment of W. WARREN BARBOUR as a Senator from the State of New Jersey to fill the vacancy created by the death of the late Senator Dwight W. Morrow.

The particular question is whether a Senator who possesses the qualifications required of a Senator at the time his term of office begins and who was duly elected becomes a Member of the United States Senate at the beginning of the term for which he was elected or whether he becomes a Member of the Senate only when and after he has taken and subscribed to the oath required by statute and the rules of the Senate.

Senator Morrow admittedly possessed the qualifications of a United States Senator. No question as to the legality of his election having been raised, he is presumed to have been duly elected and qualified. He was elected United States Senator in the State of New Jersey at the general election in November, 1930. He immediately caused to be filed in the United States Senate his credentials and certificate of election from the Chief Executive of the State of New Jersey. He was elected for a term of office commencing March 4, 1931. There was no session of Congress between March 4, 1931, and December 7, 1931. He died between March 4 and the convening of the Senate and therefore did not take or subscribe to said oath required of United States Senators.

The question is, Was he a Member of the United States Senate at the time that he died? If not, then the question arises as to whether there could be a vacancy in the membership of the United States Senate from the State of New Jersey which would authorize the appointment by the Governor of the State of New Jersey of a successor to Senator Morrow. If the Governor of New Jersey had no constitutional authority to appoint Senator BARBOUR, then his appointment is a nullity and void, and the question can be raised at any time.

The determination therefore of the question is not a moot question simply because Senator BARBOUR has been permitted to take the oath of office and take his seat in the Senate. The question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate because it involved a constitutional question and the Senate desired to have this committee study, report, and advise the Senate with regard to the question raised.

The determination of this question is also material and vital so that it may be determined when a Senator is entitled to perform the duties of a Senator, to obtain offices, assistants, compensation, immunity from arrest in going to and returning from sessions of the Senate, and other rights and privileges essential to the proper performance of the duties of a Senator. If a Senator is not a Member of the Senate until he takes the oath of office, the question arises whether he can be granted any of the privileges and benefits of a Member of the Senate between the time his term of office begins and the time that he takes and subscribes to such oath of office.

Still another serious question is dependent upon the determination of the constitutional question submitted. For instance, in the so-called Dietrich case, Dietrich was elected to the United States Senate from the State of Nebraska. No questions were raised as to his qualifications as a Senator nor as to the legality of his election. Subsequent to the beginning of the term for which he was elected, but prior to the time he took the oath of office as Senator and took his seat in that body, he was indicted under section 1781 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making it a crime for any Member of Congress to accept a bribe for the purpose of performing an official act.

The case was fought on technical grounds, and, for the purpose of the decision, the facts were admitted. The defendant was cleared on the grounds that, not having taken the oath of office and his seat in the Senate, he was not a member of the Senate at the time the crime was committed. The court sustained its decision in this matter by reference to the precedents of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives. The opinion was strained, and, in my opinion, miscontrued the few precedents that were cited. (United States v. Dietrich, 126 Fed. 676.)

The foregoing reasons show the materiality of a decision by the Senate on the constitutional question submitted by the resolution. The determination of this question involves:

(a) What is the United States Senate?

(b) When do Senators become members of the United States Senate?

(c) How are Senators elected and what control in the matter has the United States Senate?

(d) Is the oath of office a prerequisite qualification to membership in the United States Senate?

(e) Discussion of the Dietrich case and the precedents cited.

WHAT IS THE UNITED STATES SENATE?

The Constitution of the United States prescribes and limits the composition, life, and jurisdiction of such body.

"Section 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote." (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 3.)

1. It is composed of two Senators from each State.
2. They are chosen by the legislature of each State.
3. For a full period of six years.

This section has been amended by the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, which changes the section only in providing that the Senators who compose the United States Senate shall be elected by the people of each State.

The obvious construction of this language is that the United States Senate exists at all times and not solely when the body is in session. Attention is called to this construction, because there is a general understanding that the United States Senate only exists while in session.

The framers of the Constitution protected the continuing character of the Senate by providing for the classification of Senators into three groups, so that two-thirds of the Senators would always be members of the United States Senate. This was accomplished through the election of one-third of the body every two years.

It differs from the House of Representatives in this respect. Every function of the House of Representatives ceases every two years at the end of the session of Congress. Its rules, its officers, its committees cease to exist at such time. The rules of the Senate, on the contrary, never expire. Its committees, chairmen, and officers, with the exception of the Vice President, continue without interruption by the adjournment of a session of Congress. Authorized investigations and other proceedings by Senators or committees are uninterrupted by the adjournment of the Congress or sessions of Congress. In matters of legislation which require the joint action of the House of Representatives the United States Senate is limited solely in the performance of its functions.

This question, it is true, was the subject of controversy from the beginning of our Government. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, in a recent decision has settled all of these questions and has held that the United States Senate is a continuing body. (McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, p. 180.)

WHEN DO SENATORS BECOME MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE?

The Senate being composed of two Senators from each State, and being chosen or elected for the period of six years, they must be Members from the time that their term of office commences and during their full term, because those who compose a body must be members of a body.

It is true that such conclusion has been controverted since the beginning of our Government until the matter was finally and affirmatively settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. This decision was rendered in the case of Barry v. United States, ex rel. Cunningham, (279 U. S. 597). The decision hinged upon the legality of the Senate adjudging the qualifications of William S. Vare for membership in the United States Senate.

Vare presented his certificate of election to the Senate while in session and demanded to take the oath of office and his seat. The Senate declined to administer him the oath of office or permit him to take his seat until it had adjudged his qualifications for the office of United States Senator.

Cunningham, being arrested by order of the United States Senate for refusing to appear before the Senate and give testimony in the matter, was proceeded against by order of the United States Senate through its sergeant at arms, Mr. Barry. Cunningham raised the question in the Supreme Court of the United States that the Senate under the Constitution could only "* * * judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members * * *" and that the oath of office was essential to membership in the United States Senate. The court denied the contention of Cunningham. It reviewed the entire constitutional question at length. On page 615 of the report the court in its opinion says:

"When a candidate is elected to either House, he of course is elected a member of the body. * * *"

HOW ARE SENATORS ELECTED AND WHAT CONTROL IN THE MATTER HAS THE UNITED STATES SENATE

The only provisions of the Constitution of the United States with regard to the election of United States Senators have hereinbefore been set out. The Senate does not owe its existence to Congress, and therefore Congress has no control over the election of United States Senators except to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications" of a Senator.

The Supreme Court in Burton v. United States (202 U. S. 344), in passing on a case where Burton, a Senator, had been convicted of an offense under section 1782 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, says:

"A Senator can not claim immunity from legislation directed to that end, simply because he is a member of a body which does not owe its existence to Congress, and with whose constitutional functions there can be no interference."

The lower court in rendering its decision, in referring to the disqualification of Burton as a Senator by reason of the conviction of such crime, says:

"He is rendered forever hereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States."

The Supreme Court in commenting upon this dictum of the lower court says:

"But the final judgment of conviction did not operate ipso facto, to vacate the seat of the convicted Senator, nor compel the Senate to expel him or to regard him as expelled by force alone of the judgment.

"This must be so for the further reason that the declaration in section 1782, that anyone convicted under its provision shall be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit 'under the Government of the United States,' refers only to offices created by or existing under the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution, and not to offices the appointments to which are made by the States acting separately, albeit proceeding, in respect of such appointments under the sanction of that instrument. While the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution, and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its Members are chosen by State legislatures and can not properly be said to hold their places 'under the Government of the United States.'"

So it is evident that the Supreme Court holds that Congress can not by statute prescribe the qualifications of a United States Senator or interfere with his services as such officer.

The Senate of the United States is granted by the Constitution certain authority relative to those who shall compose the membership of the United States Senate. Such delegated authority in the nature of our Government must be construed and exercised with the idea of preserving the protection of the States guaranteed in the Constitution relative to representation in the United States Senate. Such authority is found in Article I, section 5, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business. * * *"

The Senate, therefore, for the purpose of carrying out the spirit of the Constitution, may investigate and determine whether a Senator was legally elected. The Senate may determine whether the Senator elect has the moral qualifications to warrant his participation in the enactment of laws that may affect every State and our foreign relations. Such investigation and determination may be made at any time. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Cunningham case, above cited, unequivocally holds that the Senate had a right to make such investigation and render a judgment thereon before the Senator is sworn in, given his seat, and permitted to participate in the business of the session of the Senate.

The Senate has heretofore held that the qualifications to be examined into are the qualifications of the Senator at the time his term of office begins rather than at the date of election. James Shields was elected to the United States Senate on January 13, 1849. On March 2, 1849, he presented his credentials to the United States Senate. It appeared that Mr. Shields was naturalized on October 21, 1840. Article I, section 3, clause 3, of the United States Constitution reads as follows:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have * * * been nine years a citizen of the United States."

In passing upon the qualifications of Mr. Shields for membership in the United States Senate the following resolution was adopted by the Senate:

"Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected." (Taft's Sen. El. Cases, 218, 222.)

If Mr. Shields had only been a Senator from the time he presented himself to the United States Senate in session, took the oath of office, and his seat, then he could have waited until October 21, 1849, and the objection that he had not been nine years a citizen of the United States would not have been tenable. So the qualifications that the Senate investigates and renders judgment upon are the qualifications possessed by the Senator at the time he becomes a Member of the Senate, if duly elected and possessing the qualifications of a Senator. The Senate, having exercised its delegated authority and having adjudged that the Senator was duly elected and possessed the qualifications of a United States Senator at the time that his term of office began, has no power thereafter to shorten the term of office of a United States Senator except by expulsion, a further authority that is granted to the United States Senate by the Constitution. The States were so jealous of their representation in the United States Senate that they provided in the Constitution that a Senator might only be expelled "with the concurrence of two-thirds" of the Senate.

IS THE OATH OF OFFICE A PREREQUISITE QUALIFICATION TO MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE?

Let us first examine the language of the Constitution relative to the oath that shall bind a United States Senator. Article VI, clause 3, provides:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned and the members of the several State legislatures and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution, but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

Let us compare this requirement with the oath prescribed for the President of the United States. It is found in Article II, eighth clause. It reads as follows:

"Before he enter on the execution of his office he shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'"

This oath expressly provides that the President "before he enter on the execution of his office" shall take the oath above set forth. Such oath is undoubtedly a prerequisite qualification to the performance of any official service.

No such prerequisite qualification is provided relative to the oath which shall bind Senators, and was evidently not intended as a prerequisite qualification of service by United States Senators. There was no form of oath prescribed with regard to United States Senators. The time and manner of taking the oath were not prescribed in the Constitution. The carrying out of this provision of the Constitution was left to statutory enactment by the Congress. When, if ever, Congress would enact such a statute could not be determined by the framers of the Constitution, and certainly they did not intend, nor did the States in ratifying the Constitution intend, that they could be deprived of the services of their Senators by the failure of Congress to perform its functions with regard to such oath. It was undoubtedly in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and of the States that ratified it, that there might be a long period of time between the beginning of a Senator's term and the time and place prescribed for the taking of the oath of office, even after such oath had been provided for in the statutes.

Suppose a Senator refuses to take the oath of office. What remedy exists is asked by those who still contend that the oath which is to bind a Senator is a prerequisite qualification to membership in the Senate?

The Constitution has granted to the Senate ample power in such an emergency. It is provided in Article I, Section V, of the Constitution, clause 2, that—

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member."

Now the statute has prescribed the form of oath to be taken by a United States Senator. It is prescribed that it shall be taken and subscribed to in an open session of the United States Senate in the presence of Members.

Rule II of the standing rules of the United States Senate provides:

"The oath or affirmation as required by the Constitution and prescribed by law shall be taken and subscribed by each Senator, in open Senate, before entering upon his duties."

Whether this rule goes beyond the constitutional authority of the Senate need not be determined.

It was evidently not intended to control the conduct of Senators during vacations between the sessions of the Senate.

The Senate, by virtue of the Constitution, the statutes, and its rules, must bind its Members by the oath prescribed. If the Senator attending the session of the Senate refuses to take the oath of office, he may be excluded from the Senate Chamber, from the offices allotted to him by the Senate. He may be prevented from taking his seat in the Chamber and from participating in legislation or other proceedings of the Senate in session until such time as he will take and subscribe to the oath as provided. Should a Senator persist in such disobedience to the laws of the United States and the rules of the Senate, he could be expelled. This is certainly ample authority and protection in the matter of binding a Senator by the oath.

The oath is not a qualification of a United States Senator but is a qualification for his participation with other Senators when assembled in session for legislative and other cooperative action. While a Senator, for the violation of such rule, or any other rule of the Senate, might be deprived of the privilege of participating in the procedure of a session of the Senate, nevertheless, he would still be a United States Senator and a Member of the Senate until his office was vacated or abandoned, or until he was expelled.

Senators, as the representatives of States, have other official duties to perform than those that are performed during a session of the Senate. They have been designated as ambassadors to the Federal Government. It is their duty to present communications and petitions from their States and from the citizens of their States to the Chief Executive of the United States. It is their duty to represent their States in conference with executive officers relative to the administration of laws that affect their States, directly or indirectly. The States can not be deprived of this service or any other constitutional service of a United States Senator by the failure or delay that may be caused by laws or rules.

The Constitution granted to the minority of the Senators, when assembled for a session, authority to compel the attendance of absent Senators. Such power was essential to the functioning of Congress, as each House can only function when a majority is present and acting.

Let us assume a hypothetical case. Suppose a number of the incumbent Senators were ill. Could those who assembled at a session compel the attendance of the newly elected Senators, whose terms of office commenced on the 4th of the preceding March? If they had not such power and such newly elected Senators should fail to come, then such session of Congress could not be organized or perform its functions.

Are such newly elected Senators granted immunity from arrest as provided in the Constitution? If not, through a conspiracy they could be arrested while going to attend a session of the Congress and thus the functioning of Congress might be prevented. In the nature of things the Senators assembled, although not constituting a quorum, must have the power to compel the attendance of the newly elected Senators, and the newly elected Senators must have the protection of immunity from arrest to insure a quorum. And yet, none of the newly elected Senators have or could possibly have taken the oath of office prescribed in the statutes and the rules.

What has been the practice of the Senate with regard to such newly elected Senators? From the beginning of their term of office, before they have taken the oath of office, they are furnished with offices in the Capitol, secretaries, stationery, and are granted every privilege that is possessed by United States Senators who have taken the oath of office. And yet such Senators, newly elected, have not and could not take the oath of office at such times or until the convening of a subsequent session of Congress.

The Senate must construe this as being in accordance with the Constitution. It must be construed that they are Members of the United States Senate, otherwise the incurring of such expense on behalf of these Senators and the granting to them of such privileges would be unconstitutional.

The Constitution provides that Members of Congress shall receive compensation. Such compensation has always been paid to Members of both the Senate and the House of Representatives from the time that their term of office began and not from the time that they took the oath of office. It is true that a statute has been passed permitting the monthly payment of the salaries to such newly elected Senators from the time the term of office commences. This is only an authorization to the financial clerks of the bodies. Unless the newly elected officers were Members of the Senate and House, payment of their salaries prior to the time they could be sworn in would be unconstitutional and any statute attempting to cure the situation would be equally unconstitutional.

Unless Senators and Representatives are Senators and Representatives from the time that their term of office commences, then the Congress of the United States could never have been organized. When the first Senate of the United States was organized no Senator was bound by any oath of office. In fact, the statute providing for such oath of office was not enacted until later on and could not be enacted until Congress was organized. The same situation existed with regard to the organization of the House of Representatives. And yet the Congress was organized without being bound by any oath, performed its functions as a Congress, enacted revenue and other laws.

If the oath of office had been essential to the performance of duties by Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the constitutional requirements with regard to the election of a President of the United States could not have been performed. This unsworn Congress met and counted the vote of the electors of the United States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States. The Constitution required that. If they had no constitutional authority to perform this service, then there was no constitutional way of determining who was elected President of the United States.

As has been stated before, the House of Representatives and everything related to it expires every two years. The newly elected Representatives meet on the first Monday of December in each year. The Constitution requires that their first act is the election of a Speaker of the House. It also provides that the Speaker of the House shall administer the oath of office to the Members of the House of Representatives. No Member of the House of Representatives can therefore possibly have taken the oath of office before he performed the official duty of participating in the election of a Speaker of the House. Such was the procedure of the House of Representatives at the beginning of the last Congress.

It is evident that the framers of the Constitution, and the States that ratified it, did not construe the oath that was to bind Senators and Members of the House of Representatives as a prerequisite qualification to being Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, or that it should interfere with their functions as such officers. The Supreme Court, however, has decided this question in the Cunningham case, hereinbefore cited. It is held unequivocally that a Senator and a Representative are Members of their respective bodies before they have been bound by the oath prescribed in the statute and the rules of the respective bodies.

DISCUSSION OF THE DIETRICH CASE AND THE PRECEDENTS CITED

This was a criminal case decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Nebraska January 8, 1904. Dietrich was charged as a Member of Congress with taking, receiving, and agreeing to receive a bribe from Jacob Fisher for procuring and aiding to procure for said Fisher the office of postmaster at Hastings, Nebr. The case was heard by the court and adjudged on the statement of facts presented by the United States Attorney. The alleged crime was committed after the term of office of Dietrich, the Senator, had commenced, but prior to his taking the oath of office and his seat in the United States Senate. Subsequent to the decision of the court, and upon the convening of a subsequent session of the Senate, he did take the oath of office and his seat and participated in the proceedings of the Senate. The opinion was rendered by Van Devanter, circuit judge. In the opening of the opinion the court says:

"The motion under consideration presents the single question: Was defendant a Member of Congress at the time of the commission of the acts charged?" (126 Fed. 677.)

The motion submitted to the court was a motion to direct a verdict of not guilty. The jury was directed by the court to return a verdict of not guilty.

The court held that Dietrich, although duly elected on March 28, 1901, to fill a vacancy in the term then current, and that he possessed the qualifications of a United States Senator, he did not become a Member of the United States Senate until December 2, 1901, upon which date he took the oath of office as a United States Senator and commenced to participate in the proceedings of the sessions of such Senate.

The court, in supporting his opinion that Dietrich did not become a Senator until he was sworn in, contends that until he presented himself for the oath of office he had never formally accepted the office; that prior to that time the Senate had never passed upon his election and qualifications; that until he presented himself and took the oath of office he could decline to accept the office; that a certificate of election and credentials were not presented to the Senate until he presented himself and was sworn in.

The court, further in its opinion, in an attempt to sustain the decision, calls attention to the fact that Dietrich was Governor of Nebraska at the time that he was elected and for a month thereafter. The court says:

"The State legislature did not and could not remove him from that office by electing him to the office of Senator in Congress."

The court further says:

"While the two offices of governor of a State and Senator in Congress can not be held by the same person at the same time, being a Senator elect is not being a Senator, and hence the same person may be governor of a State and a Senator elect at the same time without holding two offices. This is the position which has been uniformly taken by the House of Representatives under that provision of the Constitution, Article I, paragraph 6, which declares: 'No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.'"

It would seem that the court should have observed that the office of governor is not an "office under the United States."

There is no prohibition in the Constitution against a person holding the office of United States Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives at the same time with the office of governor or any other State office.

The court cites only two relevant precedents in support of its contention. It cites the Herrick case, decided by the House of Representatives in 1816. The statement of the Herrick case by the court is as follows:

"Samuel Herrick, while holding the office of United States district attorney, was elected to the House of Representatives in that Congress in October, 1816, and after his election continued to hold the office of district attorney until within two days of the beginning of the first session of that Congress in December, 1817, when he resigned it preparatory to accepting membership in the House of Representatives. It was ruled that he was not a Member in advance of the organization of that body, or in advance of his admission thereto, and therefore that there had been no concurrent holding of two incompatible offices."

The House finally seated Herrick by a vote of 72 to 70. There seems to be no record that this precedent of the House was ever before quoted or was ever afterwards quoted in any contested case.

There were two arguments, however, upon which the decision of the House might have been sustained. In the first place, the constitutional provision referred to might be construed as only affecting the "holding" of office, and not as a disqualification of the election to the House of Representatives. Such construction of the Constitution, however, would be a limitation upon the term of office of a Representative in Congress. The other argument, that he could not be a Member of the House of Representatives before its organization and before it came into existence, if it has any force, does not apply to the United States Senate. The House expires at the end of each Congress, while the Senate is a continuing body.

The case is not in point, however, as Dietrich was not holding an office under the United States but under the State of Nebraska, while Herrick until just prior to being sworn in, was holding an office under the United States.

The argument used by the court in its opinion that the office can not be forced on a United States Senator is undoubtedly sound, but the statement of facts in the case showed that the office was not forced on Dietrich. The fact that he was a candidate in an election for the office and that he accepted the certificate of such election and his credentials conclusively rebuts even a presumption that the office was imposed upon him. His subsequent presentation of his credentials and certificate, and the taking of the oath of office for United States Senator conclusively rebuts even the suggestion that the office might have been imposed upon him. He accepted the nomination as a candidate for the election, he accepted the results of the election, he accepted the certificate and his credentials, and he accepted everything that was essential to his becoming a United States Senator. The fact that he remained for one month as Governor of the State of Nebraska after his election and after he became a Senator was not complained of by the State and was not incompatible, so far as the Constitution and Federal laws are concerned, with holding the office of United States Senator.

The court in its opinion indicates that it was the belief of the court that a Senator, even one who is duly elected and possesses the qualifications, can not become a Senator until the Senate has tried him and has affirmatively found that he was duly elected and qualified and has accepted him as a Member of the United States Senate.

As a matter of fact, there is no such procedure in the United States Senate. Verity is given by the Senate to the certificate of election and the credentials of his State on behalf of a Senator of the United States, and no investigation or trial with regard to the election or qualifications of a United States Senator is ever had by the Senate except upon contest or unless it comes to the attention of the Senate through proper evidence that a Senator claiming a seat in the United States Senate has not been duly elected or does not possess the qualifications for the office. In 99 cases out of a 100 such certificates of election are accepted as prima facie evidence of the legal election of the Senator and his qualifications.

The Senate may even take judicial notice of the election of a United States Senator. In Brown v. Pipes (91 U. S. 37), the court states concerning judicial notice:

"In this country such notice is taken of the appointment of members of the Cabinet, the election and resignation of Senators, etc."

It is upon such judicial notice that the Senate may require the attendance of a Senator at sessions of the Senate even before his certificate of election is filed in the Senate.

The Dietrich case should not stand as a legal precedent. It is not sound. The result in the Dietrich case is humiliating to the Congress and to the United States Senate. It is an astounding example of the evasion of justice in high places. It permits a Senator or Representative to evade punishment for a most disreputable crime committed during his term of office by simply refraining from attending a session of Congress after his term of office begins and during the period of time which he is committing an offense which is prohibited of a Member of the United States Senate or House of Representatives.

The determination of this single constitutional question does not involve any other constitutional question, nor does it involve the construction of any State or Federal statute, nor does it affect any case now pending before the Senate.

I respectfully submit that the Committee on the Judiciary should make its report to the Senate and that the Senate should express itself in this particular.

CUBA'S FIGHT FOR FREEDOM—ADDRESS BY H. S. RUBENS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the radio on May 20, 1932, by Horatio S. Rubens, in commemoration of the thirtieth anniversary of the independence of Cuba.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am indeed fortunate to have the opportunity, because of my intimate association with the Cuban revolution, to recall to the American people their effective aid in the founding of a sister Republic, an achievement in which every American will continue to feel a just pride. For Cuba, May 20, 1902, became independence day. Thirty years ago to-day the Cuban flag of the single star was raised on the staff of Morro Castle, which guards the entrance to Habana Harbor. Here for centuries had flown the red and yellow colors of Spain—said by her American colonies to represent her overseas policy, the red for blood and the yellow for gold.

That first independence day was a day of solemnity as well as ecstatic joy. There was no such outburst of enthusiasm as was demonstrated in allied countries on Armistice Day in 1918. The great ideal—freedom—had been achieved, but the Cubans remembered the cost; they remembered their dead, an appalling toll that had been mounting since the close of our Civil War.

For 10 years, from 1868 to 1878, the Cubans fought the fight for freedom until compelled to agree to terms of peace, which the Spanish Government then ignored. The urge to cast off the yoke of Spain lay dormant but far from forgotten for nearly 15 years, when organization was undertaken by an inspired writer and orator, Jose Marti, then living in exile in New York.

Wealthy Cubans had started and sustained the 10 years' revolt, but Marti appealed to the poor in purse who were rich in the spirit of patriotism. These he organized into political clubs, in the United States and abroad, that from then on contributed their small individual but large and continuing collective sums. No single penny nor the merest handful of rifle cartridges was too small a gift to be received with gratitude. By such a gathering of mites was the Cuban revolutionary army maintained.

EXILED LEADERS RETURN

On February 24, 1895, a few bold spirits took the field. Veteran leaders of the Ten Years' War had pledged themselves to leave their exile and take command in Cuba. The story of how Marti, the organizer of the revolution, with Maximo Gomez, its general in chief, reached Cuba, accompanied by only four others, landing at night on a lonely shore, in a small rowboat, is romance. How Gen. Antonio Maceo and his comrades landed from a small schooner, to be almost immediately attacked, and their subsequent wandering in the Cuban jungles until they met the men under arms is a truly modern Odyssey.

Great was the enthusiasm when these leaders at last took command of the handful of rebels who roamed forest and mountainside awaiting direction and supplies. It mattered not that these soldiers of liberty wore no uniforms, that they were armed with a motley collection of weapons—anything from a shotgun or a sporting rifle to a relic of the campaign of 1868. These fanatic crusaders for the liberation of their country—the most daring and self-sacrificing zealots in the modern history of the Americas—were inspired by the words of the Cuban national anthem, "To die for our country is to live." And, knowing the history of their country, they expected to die.

So began the unequal struggle that was to last for three and one-half years. Its inequality was such as to appeal to every person versed in the history of our own Revolutionary War. At one period Spain had an army of 200,000 regular troops operating in Cuba, with thousands of irregulars and militia in addition. England never had more than 60,000 men at any one time opposed to her American colonists. Our colonials had the North, Middle Atlantic, and South Atlantic States through which to scatter; Cuba her very restricted territory, no larger than the State of Pennsylvania. She could not retreat. In no part of the island could her troops retire more than 40 miles from a coast guarded by Spanish vessels.

FACE TREMENDOUS ODDS

The American Colonials had an equality of weapons; the Cubans fought against modern repeating military rifles, in the hands of an enemy that had the use of the telephone, telegraph, and heliograph, and many miles of railroad. Against us England had none of these advantages.

Spain executed rebels, whether taken in action or in the towns. She spared not the rebel wounded. After each fight the Cuban wounded had to be carried on litters or flung across horses until a comparatively isolated spot in the jungle was found to establish a temporary hospital—virtually without medicines. Should this refuge be discovered, the wounded were inevitably slaughtered by the Spanish commanders.

Destruction of crops by both Spanish and Cuban troops brought on conditions verging on starvation for the army of liberation. At such times any animal, be it a lizard or a snake, went into the rebel stewpot. Frequently the only resource was to boil grass and weeds and make believe it was vegetable soup.

Marti, the master mind of the movement, was killed in action shortly after his arrival in Cuba. His organization was carried on in the United States by what was known as the Cuban Junta, of which I, though an American, became a member and its general counsel. Since it was one of the duties of this body, with headquarters in New York, to ship arms and ammunition to sustain the forces in Cuba, I had the good fortune to engage in one of the most exciting and exacting legal assignments for which a youthful lawyer ever volunteered.

Spurred by Spain, the American Government used its special Treasury agents and Secret Service, a considerable number of naval vessels, and United States revenue cutters to prevent supplies leaving this country. Spain at one time had 80 vessels patrolling the Cuban coast. Thus we had to run two blockades, one out of the United States from Atlantic and Gulf ports and the other into Cuba. Despite this double cordon, every one of the 36 official expeditions actually made its scheduled landing. Seizures were made in this country, but in each case we were able to get clear after a court hearing.

The story of these filibustering expeditions, could it be told in so short a time, would prove one of high daring and dramatic adventure. It is adventure which never will be repeated.

REVOLT BECOMES WIDESPREAD

Despite their tremendous handicaps, the Cubans, wily and audacious in the field, spread the revolt from east to west through the length of the island, defeating Spain's most famous general. He was succeeded by a man who had earned the unenviable name of "the butcher." He it was who conceived the diabolical idea of defeating the Cuban people by exterminating them. He ordered the entire rural population to concentrate in the towns, where there was for them neither occupation nor food. Women and children, old and young, were thus condemned to slow starvation. The Cuban race was to be wiped out, root and branch, "even unto the third generation." There would be no recurrence of a rebel movement, because the women, the breeders, and their children were all to disappear.

There have been instances of starving people in recent times, but never except in Cuba was this starvation brought about with malice aforethought and by governmental decree. The American minister to Spain just prior to the Spanish-American War declared that the population of Cuba had been reduced from 1,600,000 to 1,000,000—a loss of 600,000 souls, mainly noncombatants.

The men in the field did not waver; they were aroused to more intense craving to gain liberty and to spare future generations, however far removed, from the horrors of such a war, from the terrors of such inhumane measures. Their motto was proclaimed. It was "Independence or death!"

AMERICAN PEOPLE SYMPATHIZE

The American people from the first sympathized with the Cubans, and naturally so. Did not the Cubans follow the example of our American colonists of 1776, as had the French and all the Spanish colonies of South and Central America? This American sympathy impressed itself on both Houses of Congress at Washington.

Here, irrespective of party affiliation, were voiced the sentiments natural to those who believed in the principles of democracy. The press of the country, feeling the pulse of the people, also took the sympathetic attitude, with the exception of those that felt bound to the administration, which for a long time ignored what it termed "popular clamor" and maintained most friendly relations with Spain.

Futile was the effort to crush the spontaneously rising sympathy of the American people with a virile race at our very doors who stood boldly for democracy as against a monarchy that violated all laws of war and humanity and went far beyond its historic cruelty in the Middle Ages. A monarchy that was exterminating a whole people within 90 miles of our shores, by slow starvation, could have scant support here.

No administration, no interest, could block the roaring demand of our people that "the murders in Cuba must cease!" The result was the intervention of the United States in Cuba and the Spanish-American War—a war for democracy and humanity.

This country had made a solemn promise to Cuba that after pacification the United States would leave the island to a government of its own. That promise was redeemed just 30 years ago, when the American flag was gloriously lowered and the Cuban flag flew in its place, the triumphant achievement of the Cuban and the American people.

Many were the imperialists who declared that "where once the American flag flies, it never comes down." But popular will decreed otherwise.

CUBAN GRATITUDE SUBSTANTIAL

The gratitude of the Cuban people to the American people is sincere and profound. If I draw a distinction between people and government, I need only remind you that the Spanish people have lately proved that they are democratic and liberty loving, in thorough disaccord with the kind of government that had ruled them and Cuba.

The Cuban people have had good reason to complain of late years at the treatment they have received from the American Government. Nevertheless, you will find no spirit of general or public protest, for the Cuban people remember the great favor received by the will of our people, and they, too, distinguish between a people and a government. Their gratitude has taken substantial form.

The day after the declaration of war on the Central Powers by the United States Cuba followed our example. She was told not to send men to the front but to increase her sugar production. This she did, at vast expense alike to Cuban and American investors in sugar properties in Cuba.

Cuba is the only country in which, during the World War, there was no profiteering. Her entire sugar crop, her chief means of livelihood, was sold for two years to our Sugar Equalization Board, which resold to the Allies and to the American refiners. The stipulated price, considering the high cost of fuel and supplies, was most moderate. Indeed, when the war was over, Cuban sugar sold for four times the price Cuba had received from the United States during the war.

In the end the Sugar Equalization Board turned into the United States Treasury some $30,000,000 profit, made mostly out of the resale of Cuban sugar. Cuba has made no appeal to our American Congress for restoration of any part of this sum, even now when she is in dire need of money.

CUBA REPAYS WAR LOAN

Cuba has declared no moratorium on her national debts. She is sending money to pay amortization and interest to American bondholders at the cost of her government employees, whose pay is vastly reduced and deferred, and at the cost of still further curtailing the circulation of money on the island. In this Cuba is to-day an outstanding exception.

And let it be known that Cuba holds another distinction. She is the only one of America's allies that has repaid the money advanced by the United States during the World War. Cuba has repaid in full, with interest at the rate originally agreed.

When the United States imposed on Cuba the Platt amendment, which established special international relationships, President Roosevelt declared that in return Cuba must be considered as a part of our economic system. He affirmed that a failure to treat Cuba properly in this respect would be tantamount to a repudiation of our promises and our duty.

PROSTRATED BY TARIFF

Cuba is in the stress of the world depression, but has been borne down by a crisis of her own since 1925. Her basic crop, raw sugar, has been subjected to an American import duty, which, though disguised as a specific duty of 2 cents a pound, has lately exceeded a rate of over 300 per cent ad valorem. There is no such duty on the most extravagant luxury imported into the United States. And between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 tons of raw sugar must even now come from Cuba to balance the demand of this country.

This tariff measure, which Roosevelt would call "repudiation," has laid Cuba prostrate. Yet you will find no anti-American feeling as between their people and our people. With the same grim courage which sustained them during the bitter days of their fight for freedom, you find them to-day fighting the soil for the root crops and the bananas that prevent starvation.

No longer do the Cubans import from the United States the vast amounts of farm products and manufactured goods which made Cuba one of our best customers—a better customer, indeed, than larger and more distant countries where we must struggle for our share of the business. Grim necessity now compels the Cubans to wrest from the soil the food they are too poor to import.

CUBAN COURAGE PERSISTS

You will be surprised, as you go to Cuba, to see the set determination to fight on and the hopefulness and good humor of these people. After seven years of depression their moral courage might well be emulated by other nations. The spirit of her soldiers of democracy has descended to the present generation.

The Cubans to-day are poor indeed, but not too proud to work at anything. Their severest problem during and after their revolution was that of subsistence. They fought from poverty to prosperity. Once more, engaged in the same struggle, they are determined to win—despite what has become an economic isolation.

The message of the Cuban to the American people, conveyed by one who knows both well, is this:

"We can never forget that the supreme sacrifice of your sons on our soil consolidated the freedom for which we fought for 13½ years. The single star of our flag will ever shine as the symbol of our gratitude."

REPUBLICAN PROHIBITION PLANK

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the present occupant of the chair would explain the meaning of the prohibition plank adopted in the Republican platform at Chicago. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, what goes on in the opposition party, in so far as the selection of candidates is concerned, is none of my business as a member of the opposition party, but I can not refrain from expressing the hope that if we are to face a ticket of standing, the present occupant of the chair will find himself upon that ticket, because during the last four years I feel that the present occupant of the chair has done more, or as much, at least, as any member of the majority party to put through such a program as has been offered here.

However, I can not be too optimistic, because I realize from reading the papers that there is a disposition to discard all elements of strength in the present campaign. Nevertheless my best wishes go to the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. President, just for a few moments I would like to renew my oft-repeated question in this body. Now that we have the so-called prohibition plank before us in black and white as adopted by the Republican Party in its Chicago convention, I wish to ask if there is any Member of the Senate who knows where the President stands on the question of prohibition?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I take it for granted the Senator did not hear the explanation of Mr. Burke, the attorney for the Republican National Committee, this morning. He told what was meant by it in a speech broadcast over the radio a little after daylight this morning.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was the right time to undertake to explain what is meant—a little after daybreak—because we were still blinking at the new light in our eyes and therefore unable to see through it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Coming at that time in the morning and coming from Mr. Burke, I think it could be easily explained, taking all things into consideration. Just read what he says and take the opposite stand, and the Senator will be right.

Now, if the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is going to discuss prohibition. I want to remind him of the fact that he has lost a couple of his allies on the prohibition question since the plank was adopted in Chicago. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], who is a Republican, and especially the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who is an expert on this question, have been compelled to desert the Senator now because while the Senator from Connecticut made a very valiant fight he was defeated. Of course, he is a regular, and he is now following the plank, whatever it means, that is in the platform. Therefore the Senator from Maryland can not expect his assistance any more in the prohibition fight.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that the plank as adopted by the Republican National Convention with reference to prohibition is a plank that is intended to satisfy the wets and to satisfy the drys, but the plank is so indefinite and so uncertain that as one who does not believe in prohibition I can not accept it at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin and to other Senators that it is not a plank. It is a conglomerate gathering of splinters. Those splinters are made up of every kind of wood in the whole wood category. There is white pine and mahogany, yellow pine and southern pine, western spruce and Oregon fir, and even the sidewalks of New York have contributed a few splinters to the plank.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to say at this point that I do not know who penned the wet-dry plank in the Republican platform—and I desire the phrase "wet-dry" hyphenated—but whoever wrote that plank was an ambidextrous amphibian. There is such an animal, and I make that contribution to the political zoo.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Oklahoma anticipated me because I thought that the right name for this plank would be the "amphibian plank," because it takes off from dry land, soars into moist atmosphere, plunges 20 feet below the ocean, and then lands in the middle of the Sahara Desert.

Now, let us analyze the plank:

The Republican Party has always stood, and stands to-day, for obedience to and enforcement of the law as the very foundation of orderly government and civilization. There can be no national security otherwise.

I wonder just what party is going to take the opposite side of that pronouncement. There is patriotism; there is candor!

Mr. GORE. And courage.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is courage; there is leadership. "Gentlemen, we stand for law and order." That is what that means.

The duty of the President of the United States and of the officers of the law is clear. The law must be enforced as they find it enacted by the people.

I never knew before that the people enacted the Volstead law.

To these courses of action we pledge our nominees.

The Republican Party is and always has been the party of the Constitution.

Of course, all Democrats, I may say facetiously, hate the Constitution. They would no more stand for the Constitution or for enforcing the law than they would advocate the adoption of the Mohammedan religion as the state religion. Democrats can not stand for the Constitution. That belongs to the Republican Party. Even socialists and progressives and conservatives and radicals can not stand for that.

Now, here is the prize piece of evasion, I think, in the whole platform:

While the Constitution makers sought a high degree of permanence, they foresaw the need of changes and provided for them. Article V limits the proposals of amendments to two methods: (1) Two-thirds of both Houses of Congress may propose amendments; or (2) on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States a national convention shall be called by Congress to propose amendments. Thereafter ratification must be had in one of two ways: (1) By the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; or (2) by conventions held in three-fourths of the several States. Congress is given power to determine the mode of ratification.

There is where we get the information as to exactly where the party stands. The Senate will notice what they advocate is just as clear as day; everybody can see it.

Referendums without constitutional sanction can not furnish a decisive answer. Those who propose them innocently are deluded by false hopes; those who propose them knowingly are deceiving the people.

A nation-wide controversy over the eighteenth amendment now distracts attention from the constructive solution of many pressing national problems. The principle of national prohibition as embodied in the amendment was supported and opposed by members of both great political parties. It was submitted to the States by Members of Congress of different political faith and ratified by State legislatures of different political majorities. It was not then and is now not a partisan political question.

Members of the Republican Party hold different opinions with respect to it, and no public official or member of the party should be pledged or forced to choose between his party affiliations and his honest convictions upon this question.

In other words, if a platform is adopted which violates every principle for which one stands, he should still be a member of the party. Principle counts for nothing; cast that aside; throw it overboard; be good Democrats and good Republicans, no matter what the party stands for. That is the philosophy of that paragraph. Now we get to the real meat of the matter:

We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention or repeal.

We are neither for repeal nor for retention. What could be more complete? We are opposed to repealing it and we are opposed to retaining it. Now, let us see where we do stand:

For the American Nation never in its history has gone backward, and in this case the progress which has thus far been made must be preserved, while the evils must be eliminated.

Why, Mr. President, I did not know there were any evils. Has it come to the point where we have recognized the fact that there are evils in connection with national prohibition?

And the gains shown have got to be retained.

The gains! There is no mention of what the gains are. I suppose they mean the gains in the number of outlets—a speak-easy at every crossroads in the country; liquor to be had in every town, village, and countryside; about three or four times the number of speak-easies that there were saloons in the places where saloons were permitted; jails filled with people; appropriations pending in the Congress to provide new penitentiaries; revenue lost to the Government; crime flourishing on a scale never before existing; murder, the handmaiden of the bootlegger, 1,365 persons having been shot down in the course of 10 years of prohibition enforcement. Even in the Capital, the District of Columbia, five times as many persons under 21 years of age have been arrested for drunkenness in the 10 years since prohibition as in the 10 years preceding it—five times as many. Those gains ought to be kept, says this platform. But it also says:

We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention or repeal.

They do not say what they do favor. They are opposed to repeal; they are opposed to retention of the eighteenth amendment; and there is nothing in between to show where the party stands.

I hope my Democratic colleagues will take a leaf out of this hypocrisy and will at least have the courage to present a platform which is understandable, candid, and honest; and if we do not do that we, too, will deserve the condemnation of the people.

The gains we have made must be retained; the evils must be eliminated. What are the gains? What are the evils? How are we to hold the gains and how are we to eliminate the evils?

We, therefore, believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment, the provisions of which, while retaining in the Federal Government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses.

We are going to allow the people in their respective States to determine what they want, but they will not have the right of local self-government because, nevertheless, the Federal Government will not let them have what they want, says this platform.

Let me read it again.

We, therefore, believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment, the provisions of which, while retaining in the Federal Government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist.

Good Lord, we have got the Webb-Kenyon Act, and everyone knows that under the interstate-commerce clause in the Constitution any reasonable application of that power will protect the dry States.

It is difficult to comment upon this platform; it is such a group of idle words, vague promises, undefined ideas, so lacking in principle, so lacking in cohesion and coherence, so lacking in candor, so lacking in honesty, so lacking in decency, and so lacking in statesmanship and so full of evasion and hypocrisy and sham and pretense and bunk that words can not be found either to characterize it adequately or to describe the state of mentality which produced such a monstrosity.

Here they say that the people have put this law into the Constitution, but the people shall not have the right, even if they want to, to take it out of the Constitution; and all of this is done in the name of democratic government and of republican government.

It looks to me as if the President's long tenure of office in England had somehow saturated his mind with the idea that this is a monarchy and not a democracy, because he says even if the people want to change this thing they shall not change it.

Thank God, there were in the Republican Party—and I take my hat off to both the wets and the drys—men who would not be a party to this hypocrisy without making honest comment and observation upon it. Men who are profound and sincere in their belief that national prohibition is a good thing did not hesitate to denounce it, even though they are Republicans; and men who are opposed to prohibition did not hesitate to denounce it, even though they are Republicans. The light of honesty from these men shines through this fog of hypocrisy and sham and pretense and is the one ray of hope in a very dark setting.

Now I want to renew my question, Mr. President. I understand that this plank comes from the White House; that it has the approval of the President. I defy any Senator in this Chamber to tell me where Herbert Hoover stands on the question of national prohibition; and I pause for an answer.

Is there one Senator, just one, who can tell us where Mr. Hoover stands on national prohibition? Is he in favor of it? I pause for an answer. Is he opposed to it? I pause for an answer. If he is neither in favor of it nor opposed to it, can anyone tell, then, where he does stand in between? Of course you can not tell; and there is not an intellect that ever lived, from Pythagoras down to the present time, who could take that statement and say in short, clipped sentences or long sentences, for that matter, what it means and what it purports to do. It is the greatest conglomeration of sham and political bunk that God Almighty ever permitted the human hand to reduce to writing. It is dishonest from its first letter to the period at the end of it. It has not a word of candor or a line or an impulse of honesty in it. It is pure political claptrap, put out neither to offend the wets nor to offend the drys, and to leave this entire question to be misinterpreted by every partisan spellbinder in each party.

Let not anyone rise again and ask me to follow the "leadership in the White House." I do not want anybody to appeal to me henceforth to follow the "leader" in the White House, because if that is the kind of orders for battle we get in this great emergency, we had better get a new general at the head of the army; and if the Democratic Party likewise adopts this philosophy, God save the Republic!

I do not want to be partisan in this discussion. I will not be; but I read the keynote speech of Mr. SNELL yesterday. He was only doing his job, because the job of keynoters is to say that everything your party does is fine and good and noble and grand, and everything that the other party does is outrageous. Mr. SNELL over and over again said that the Democratic Party was thus and so; but the great leader in the White House, the great, noble crusader, was the man who would bring the ship of state through these stormy times and land it safely in the harbor of peace and prosperity. Well, if Mr. SNELL calls that leadership on a question which more people have an opinion upon than any other, then we have a preface to the kind of leadership we will get during the next four years in the event of Republican success.

I call upon wets, I call upon drys, I call upon modificationists everywhere who desire to see the cause of honest, representative government make progress, to denounce this plank, and if the Democrats write one like it to denounce that plank, and let us give the people a chance to vote on a clear-cut issue and a chance to express their desires, and make an end to this damnable hypocrisy in a time when we are floundering around in the greatest depression of all history.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill for action upon the amendments of the committee.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Naval Establishment, office of the Secretary, pay, miscellaneous," on page 2, line 7, after the word "employees," to insert "including not to exceed $1,500 for the expenses of attendance, at home and abroad, upon meetings of technical, professional, scientific, and other similar organizations when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such attendance would be of benefit in the conduct of the work of the Navy Department," so as to read:

For commissions and interest; transportation of funds, including the cost of insurance on shipments of money by registered mail when necessary; exchange; for traveling expenses of civilian employees, including not to exceed $1,500 for the expenses of attendance, at home and abroad, upon meetings of technical, professional, scientific, and other similar organizations when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such attendance would be of benefit in the conduct of the work of the Navy Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the word "home," to strike out "in other than history, languages, civil government, and literature, and cost of special instruction" and insert the word "and," so as to read:

Cost of special instruction at home and abroad, including maintenance of students and attachés, and not to exceed $9,750 for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, sec. 118a).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 18, after the word "thereof," to strike out the comma and "and the expenditures for such purposes shall be accounted for specifically," so as to read:

Information from abroad and at home, and the collection and classification thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval training stations, Bureau of Navigation," on page 11, line 3, after the name "California," to strike out "$166,300" and insert "$160,200," so as to read:

San Diego, Calif., $160,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 4, after the name "Rhode Island," to strike out "$182,000" and insert "$202,000," so as to read:

Newport, R. I., $202,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 5, after the name "Illinois," to strike out "$252,900" and insert "$245,000," so as to read:

Great Lakes, Ill., $245,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 6, after the name "Virginia," to strike out "$231,000" and insert "$225,000," so as to read:

Hampton Roads, Va., $225,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve," on page 12, line 15, after the word "aircraft," to strike out "$3,077,686" and insert "$3,727,686," so as to read:

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $3,727,686.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill why this increase is proposed—an increase of $650,000?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that this increase and the increase that we have made for taking care of the pay of the midshipmen who were given commissions over and above the number provided by law this year are substantially the only large increases that the committee has put into the bill. This $650,000 will enable the Naval Reserves of the country to carry on their annual summer cruise as they have always done in the past. The Budget provided for this expense; and when the question came up in the House the department, in order to economize, suggested leaving this out. The Naval Reserves were bitterly disappointed when they were told that they probably would have to give up their summer cruise; and the Senate committee, in going over the matter, decided that they would add this amount to the bill, and thus enable them to do as they had been doing in the past.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I see from the general report submitted by the Senator from Maine that the net reduction in the bill as reported to this body, as compared with the amount of the bill as passed by the House, is $8,134,998.

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator to state in a general way in what that reduction consists?

Mr. HALE. Very well, Mr. President.

When the department made up its figures for the Budget last fall it asked for some $397,000,000. The Budget cut down those figures to $341,000,000. The House, after extensive hearings, cut down the Budget figure from $341,000,000 to $326,000,000. The Senate committee has further cut that $326,000,000 down by slightly over $8,000,000.

When the bill came to the Senate from the House I talked with the Secretary of the Navy and the officials of the department and told them that we must make some cuts over here; that there were propositions to cut down all of the bills 10 per cent, and I asked them whether that was a possible thing to do in the case of the Navy. They said it certainly was not if we wanted to run the Navy. I told them to go to work and make whatever cuts they possibly could make and still be able to carry on; and one of the cuts that has been made is under "Increase of the Navy."

On page 51 of the bill, under "Increase of the Navy," the Senator will see that the House figures of $23,063,000 were cut down to $15,063,000, a reduction of $8,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The principal reduction, then, is associated with that item, the "Increase of the Navy?"

Mr. HALE. The principal reduction is under "Increase of the Navy." Along with that, under "Increase of the Navy," goes another item on page 52, line 15, where we have cut down from $4,167,333 to $3,000,000, a reduction of some $1,167,000.

Under the bill there are no appropriations for starting the construction of any new ships of the Navy with the exception of one of the three 8-inch-gun cruisers which under the terms of the London treaty may be started this year. There is a small appropriation in the bill for that. Other than that, no new construction is provided for. This reduction that was made will be taken out of the work that is being done on the ships that are now under construction, and it probably can be done without any injury to the Navy, as there have been complications in questions connected with the machinery of the ships, and in all probability this amount of money will not have to be spent during the coming year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 12, at the end of line 25, to strike out "$336,375" and insert "$435,378," so as to read:

Of which amount not more than $150,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage; not more than $81,000 shall be available for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department; not less than $575,079 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, and not more than $435,378 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 4, after the name "Naval Reserve," to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my attention was distracted for a moment. I inquire of the chairman of the committee with respect to the item found on page 12, $3,727,686 for the Naval Reserve. An increase of approximately $700,000 has been made in this item by the Senate committee above the appropriation carried in the bill as it came from the House. Will the Senator explain the reason or justification for this large increase?

Mr. HALE. I have just explained to the Senator from Arkansas the reason for the increase.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I just came into the Chamber.

Mr. HALE. The reason is that we are permitting the Naval Reserve to have their annual cruise this year just as they have always had in the past, and that requires an additional appropriation of about $650,000. When we are allowing the citizens' military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the National Guard to have their annual camps, it seemed a little rough on the Navy to make one particular exception of them and not allow the Naval Reserve to do what they always have done, and what is necessary for their training.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator what amount has been expended in the past for this cruise.

Mr. HALE. Last year it was slightly more than $682,000. This year they think they can get along with $650,000.

Mr. KING. What is the entire cost, the entire amount?

Mr. HALE. The entire cost of the cruises this year will amount to $650,000.

Mr. KING. But the appropriation is $3,727,000. Does the Senator mean to say that that entire amount is consumed in making the Naval Reserve cruise?

Mr. HALE. That is the total appropriation for the reserve. The annual cruise item amounts to $650,000.

Mr. KING. How many men are there in the Naval Reserve?

Mr. HALE. In the active Naval Reserve there are about 10,000—about 1,000 officers and 9,000 men. These are the men who take these summer cruises. They are distributed around all over the country in small units. I think there are 139 divisions of about 55 men each. These men were very much disappointed when they were told that they could not carry on their annual cruise as they have always done.

Mr. KING. Does the experience of the Navy justify the maintenance of this plan?

Mr. HALE. Oh, I think so. This is the real training that they get on real ships of the Navy; and I think the experience of the Navy shows that these men, especially in the last war, were of great value when we got into actual hostilities.

Mr. KING. What proportion of those who avail themselves of the cruise are officers? Of course the residue, I suppose, would be "gobs."

Mr. HALE. They all turn out. As I said, there are about 1,000 officers and 9,000 men in the active reserve.

Mr. KING. All of them have had naval service?

Mr. HALE. They are all in the reserve.

Mr. KING. Have all the officers and men had prior naval service?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; not at all. These are not fleet reserve. These correspond to the National Guard. There are companies of these men all over the United States.

Mr. KING. I understand, but what I am trying to ascertain is whether they are recruited annually, or whether there are allotments from preceding years and whether any of those allotments from preceding years would go back to the days of the war?

Mr. HALE. Some of the men were in the service during the war.

Mr. KING. That would be true of the men as well as of the officers?

Mr. HALE. They are building up their units all the time, losing certain men and adding others, but at the present time there are very many who served in the war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps," on page 15, line 8, after the word "for," to strike out "any expense" and insert "mileage, pay, or subsistence," so as to read:

Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for mileage, pay, or subsistence incident to training or practice cruises of members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, but members of such corps denied such cruises in consequence hereof shall not be refused appointments as ensigns in the Naval Reserve by reason thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa.," on page 16, after line 17, to strike out:

For pay of employees at rates of pay to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy, $86,525.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of employees, $86,525: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel," on page 23, line 13, after the word "orders," to strike out "(not to exceed, exclusive of officers designated pursuant to law as additional numbers, 5,499 commissioned officers of the line, 908 officers of the Medical Corps, 186 officers of the Dental Corps, 556 officers of the Supply Corps, 83 officers of the Chaplain Corps, 233 officers of the Construction Corps, 109 officers of the Civil Engineer Corps, and 1,461 warrant and commissioned warrant officers)"; in line 23, after the word "pay," to strike out "$30,653,486" and insert "$31,513,421"; and in line 24, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$1,014,250" and insert "$1,191,850," so as to read:

Pay of naval personnel: For pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders, pay—$31,513,421, including not to exceed $1,191,850 for increased pay for making aerial flights.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Maine to page 23. I observe an increase in the appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars, the increase being shown in lines 23 and 24. Can the Senator explain the reason for this increase?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when the class which just completed the course at Annapolis came to graduate it was found that the officers of the Navy were within 29 of the number allowed under existing law, that number being 5,499. In the graduating class there were about 421 midshipmen. Congress, in the case of those men, passed a law this year providing that the whole of the graduating class should be given commissions, and of course that would mean that the number of officers in the Navy would exceed the 5,499 allowed by law. Under the provision of the appropriation bill as passed by the House, before the law giving these midshipmen their commissions was passed, the midshipmen were not taken into consideration, and the Senate committee has simply added what was necessary under the law to take care of the extra number.

Mr. KING. Did not the House Committee on Appropriations take cognizance of the situation and did they not contemplate an appropriation?

Mr. HALE. They could not. At that time there was no authority for it. Congress has passed the law since that time.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand, this increase is made necessary wholly because of the graduation of a larger number of midshipmen?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, $682,000 of the $859,935 which appears in the increase on line 24 was for the pay of the midshipmen and $177,600 was transferred from another portion of the bill to take care of the flight pay for aviation.

The House committee undertook to reduce the flight pay for aviation and to provide that no aviator drawing flight pay should draw more than $1,100 a year. But that proposition was turned down by the House itself. The amount they would have had to spend for this flight pay, if it were a maximum of $1,100 a year, would have been $1,014,250, but that does not take in what they would have to spend under the present law, which gives them time and a half for flight pay, making a difference of $177,600. That, added to the midshipmen's pay, makes up the increase in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 2, after the figures "$3,705,180," to insert the following:

And the rental and subsistence allowances for the fiscal year 1933 shall be the same as for the fiscal year 1932, subject to such reduction therein as may be necessary under the provisions of section 102, Part II, of the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think that amendment is necessary. It was put in to take care of the case of a double deduction under subsistence and allowances under the provision of the pay cuts which were recommended by the Economy Committee, but were not adopted in the Senate, and subsistence and allowance items do not appear in the economy bill under the House provision for a pay cut or under the Senate provision for a furlough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 7, to increase the appropriation for pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders, etc., from $40,457,181 to $41,317,116.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 19, after the word "officers," to strike out "(not to exceed 5,910 chief petty officers and 850 chief petty officers under acting appointment)," so as to read:

Pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineer's force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, enlisted men, men in trade schools, pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, extra pay for men for diving, and cash prizes (not to exceed $71,500) for men for excellence in gunnery, target practice, and engineering competitions, $63,729,756, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 7, to increase the total appropriation for pay of naval personnel from $130,751,221 to $131,611,156.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 9, after the word "officers," to insert "in excess of six," so as to read:

And no part of such sum shall be available to pay active duty pay and allowances to officers in excess of six on the retired list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 9, after the word "list," to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter no enlisted man of the Navy shall be assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 783).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 17, after the word "men," to strike out "(not to exceed $450,000)," so as to read:

Transportation and recruiting of naval personnel: For mileage and actual and necessary expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law to officers of the Navy while traveling under orders, including not to exceed $2,000 for the expenses of attendance at home and abroad, upon meetings of technical, professional, scientific, and other similar organizations, when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such attendance would be of benefit in the conduct of the work of the Navy Department; for mileage, at 5 cents per mile, to midshipmen entering the Naval Academy while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen, and not more than $2,500 shall be available for transportation of midshipmen, including reimbursement of traveling expenses while traveling under orders after appointment as midshipmen; for actual traveling expenses of female nurses; for travel allowance or for transportation and subsistence as authorized by law of enlisted men upon discharge; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen and applicants for enlistment at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen and insane supernumerary patients to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation; expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties; transportation of dependents of officers and enlisted men; expenses of funeral escorts of naval personnel; in all, $4,017,173.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 18, after the figures "$4,017,173," to strike out the comma and "and not more than $593,479 of such sum shall be available for travel by officers, midshipmen, and female nurses."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 22, before the word "of," to strike out "$149,052,211" and insert "$149,912,146," so as to read:

In all, for pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel, $149,912,146, of which sum $1,000,000 shall be immediately available, and the money herein specifically appropriated, or transferred from the clothing and small stores' fund to this appropriation as herein authorized, for "Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel," shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 7, after the word "Veterans'," to strike out "Bureau" and insert "Administration," and in line 9, after the word "numbers," to strike out "not specifically," so as to read:

Provided, That additional commissioned, warranted, appointed, enlisted, and civilian personnel of the Medical Department of the Navy, required for the care of patients of the United States Veterans' Administration in naval hospitals, may be employed in addition to the numbers appropriated for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 4, after the word "admission," to strike out the colon and the following provisos:

Provided further, That hereafter no person holding a civil office or position, appointive or elective, under the Federal Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia or under any corporation a majority of the capital stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States, shall be entitled, during the period of such incumbency, to retired pay from the United States for or on account of services as a commissioned officer in the Navy or Marine Corps at a rate in excess of an amount which when combined with the annual rate of compensation from any such civil office or position makes the total rate from both sources more than $3,000; and when the retired pay amounts to or exceeds the rate of $3,000 per annum such person shall be entitled to the pay of the civil office or position or the retired pay, whichever he may elect: Provided, That the term "retired pay" shall be construed to include credits for all military or naval service as lawfully may enter into the computation thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," on page 31, line 6, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for any expense for or incident to the transportation of privately owned automobiles except on account of the return to the United States of such privately owned automobiles as may be in transit to or from points outside of the continental limits of the United States or have been transported to such outside points at public expense on or by the date of the approval of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That not more than $5,000 shall be available for any expense for or incident to the transportation of privately owned automobiles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Fuel and transportation, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," on page 32, line 21, after the figures "$6,735,000," to insert "and, in addition, $150,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation 'Fuel and transportation, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, 1932,' is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year 1933," so as to read:

For coal and other fuel for submarine bases and steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same and the removal of fuel refuse from ships; maintenance and general operation of machinery of naval fuel depots and fuel plants; water for all purposes on board naval vessels, and ice for the cooling of water, including the expense of transportation and storage of both, $6,735,000 and, in addition, $150,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation "Fuel and transportation, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, 1932," is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge what equipage, supplies, and services, under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, are contemplated in the appropriation of $9,417,500 provided we meet these activities?

Mr. HALE. To what page is the Senator referring?

Mr. KING. To page 30, beginning with line 22, under "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, $9,417,500."

I may add, before I resume my seat, I find under the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts and other places in the bill where there are accounting organizations. I am told by an officer of the General Accounting Office that in the Federal service there are several hundred organizations to care for accounts. If a little bureau is created, or a little commission is created, there follows automatically a large accounting division or organization, so that there are hundreds in the United States service, whereas if there were any proper economy or business methods, they could be reduced, I am advised, materially.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts is the Quartermaster Department of the Navy, and of course they have to take care of all the supplies of the Navy. As far as the question of new accounts is concerned, it is not a question of starting up an accounting division, it is a question of bookkeeping. I do not think they have any additional men for doing that. There are several principal accounts—the stores account, the clothing account, the Navy supply account, the appropriations purchase account, and things of that sort. But this is simply a question of bookkeeping. I do not think it is a question of building up any additional personnel. I think the Navy operates very economically. I know that during the war they made an excellent reputation, and the system of bookkeeping adopted by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts is being followed in many of the other departments of the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my criticism was not directed particularly against the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, but to the practices in the Government—not in the Navy Department alone but in all of the departments—of having such a large number of accounting organizations.

Mr. HALE. I think that is simply a question of bookkeeping. I do not think there is any question of additional expenditure.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error in regard to that, may I say, if he will pardon me? But the Senator has not yet answered the question I propounded as to the reason for the large appropriation of $9,417,500 found on page 31. I ask for information as to what equipage, supplies, and services are provided for in this large appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the services ashore include purchase of all supplies and services for all bureaus; disbursement of all funds for the Naval Establishment in payment for materials, and services rendered; accounting for materials purchased and manufactured, including the maintenance of accounting records incident to both, the maintenance of appropriation and cost records for all work performed at navy yards and stations; receipt and storage of materials purchased and manufactured under the naval supply account fund and other appropriations, and the issue of these materials to ships and stations for use and for manufacture of other items.

Transportation: Household effects of naval personnel, packing, and shipping, via common carrier or Government conveyance, including collection from and delivery to quarters or residence; equipage and supplies, transported by common carriers between stations and ships.

These services require labor, materials, and services other than personnel, including a considerable amount of freight (rail and water borne), express, and parcel-post charges. The bulk of the expenditure under this appropriation is for pay of civilian personnel at naval shore stations. If there is an arbitrary reduction in numbers to come within a certain total, there is a resultant decrease in rendition of service, which—except as it may result in adverse criticism—does not concern the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, but does vitally affect the operation of the Navy.

The services afloat include equipage and supplies: For supply and disbursing departments, galleys, and messes, and certain equipment and supplies for commanding, executive, communication, and navigating officers of ships, boards, and courts on ships, and chaplains.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Medical Department," on page 35, line 2, after the word "to," to strike out "the Government Hospital for the Insane" and insert "St. Elizabeths Hospital," so as to read:

For the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane of the Navy and Marine Corps on the Pacific coast, including supernumeraries held for transfer to St. Elizabeths Hospital.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks, maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 37, line 6, after the word "chauffeurs," to strike out "and of" and insert "but not including the compensation of 90," so as to read:

Provided, That expenditures from appropriations contained in this act for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, including the compensation of civilian chauffeurs, but not including the compensation of 90 enlisted men detailed to such duty, shall not exceed in the aggregate $70,000, exclusive of such vehicles owned and operated by the Marine Corps in connection with expeditionary duty without the continental limits of the United States and motor cycles, and on any one vehicle shall not exceed for maintenance, upkeep, and repair, exclusive of garage rent, pay of operators, tires, fuel, and lubricants, one-third of the market price of a new vehicle of the same make or class, and in any case more than $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 38, line 6, after the word "respectively," to strike out "$2,790,000" and insert "$2,490,000," so as to read:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to complete, provide, or continue the construction, by contract or otherwise, of the public works and public-utilities projects named in the naval appropriation act, fiscal year 1932, including the naval lighter-than-air base near Sunnyvale, Calif., provided for in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, and within the limits of cost specified in those acts; and to construct or provide, by contract or otherwise, the following-named public works and public-utilities projects, at a limit of cost not to exceed the amount stated for each project enumerated, respectively, $2,490,000, of which not to exceed $150,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field service to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Aeronautics, aviation, Navy," on page 40, line 13, after the word "equipment," to strike out "$13,578,805" and insert "$13,401,205"; and on page 41, line 10, after the words "in all," to strike out "$25,388,705" and insert "$25,211,105," so as to read:

For aviation, as follows: For navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1932, $949,900; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, air stations, fleet air bases, fleet and all other aviation activities, accident prevention, testing laboratories, for overhauling of planes, and for the purchase for aviation purposes only of special clothing, wearing apparel and special equipment, $13,401,205, including $153,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults and including not to exceed $175,000 for the procurement of helium, and such sum shall be transferred to and made available to the Bureau of Mines on July 1, 1932; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, including the payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed, $2,210,000; for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization carried in the Navy appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932 for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories, $7,200,000; toward the construction of the rigid airships as provided in the act authorizing construction of aircraft, etc., approved June 24, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 34, sec. 749a), and subject to the contractural conditions stipulated as to such rigid airships in the act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year 1929, $1,450,000; in all, $25,211,105; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether it is the purpose of the department to continue what I regard as a most wasteful and unnecessary policy of building rigid airships? The accidents that have occurred have been numerous. It seems to me that the waste of money in the purchases of ships that were built abroad, as well as those which are being built in the United States, can not be justified under the present condition of the Government.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, we have just completed the airship Akron, and she has turned out very successfully, I believe. We are now building one more ship, under the provisions of the law. We got the two for a reduction of price over what we would have had to pay if we had built them separately. The third airship which we have—the Los Angeles—is either out of commission now or to be put out of commission, and we are to keep the Akron alone in commission until the second ship, which is building, is put in commission.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Will the Senator please tell the Senate and the country what practical value has accrued to the defense of the Nation from these rigid airships?

Mr. HALE. Nobody can tell exactly what effect they would have in war. I personally have never been very enthusiastic about the rigid airships, but the Navy feels that cases will come up where they would be valuable in warfare. At least for negative scouting they are extremely valuable.

Mr. DILL. For what kind of scouting?

Mr. HALE. Negative scouting.

Mr. DILL. What does the Senator mean by negative scouting?

Mr. HALE. I was just about to explain to the Senator. They can scout over a very large area of territory. They carry planes by using which they can discover whether the enemy is anywhere about within certain sections. If the enemy happens to be about, of course, they are more or less vulnerable.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think the scouting of one of these immense rigid airships is going to enable the Navy to discover anybody anywhere else within 100 miles of where they are at sea?

Mr. HALE. They cover a far greater scouting area than 100 square miles—more than 100 miles.

Mr. DILL. But my point is that the airship is so immense and can be seen so far that it becomes a target for the enemy. I may be incapable of understanding the principles of defense and attack, but I can not conceive of anything that would be so vulnerable to attack as one of these great airships, hanging in the air as they do.

Mr. HALE. It is of very great value from the military point of view for these airships to be able to assure the fleet that there are no enemy ships within a certain area. They can cover a much greater scouting area than either a surface ship or an airplane.

Mr. DILL. If these great rigid airships start out over the ocean for any distance, they must carry with them battle planes to defend the airship, or they would be at the mercy of the fast planes of the enemy which could reach them much more quickly than they could see the enemy and get away.

Mr. HALE. The new ships carry airplanes as a part of their equipment.

Mr. DILL. I suppose the theory is that the planes on the airships would cut loose and go out and fight the other planes that come from the enemy. As I have read of experiments with these great rigid airships, I am impressed that they afford a most interesting experience for the naval officers who manipulate them, and they may be of some value from the standpoint of developing commercial aircraft of this kind; but from the standpoint of naval defense it seems to me they are the greatest waste that is to be found in any of the defensive arms of the Government. I can not understand in a time like this, when we are pressed for every dollar that we expend, why we should go ahead now with a proposal here to spend $1,500,000 for these purposes. I do not know whether it is to build more new ones or not.

Mr. HALE. I quite agree with the Senator about the value of the airships for military purposes. Personally I do not think they are very useful. Of course, they are also of value if we want to send a contingent of officers or men to Panama, for instance. They can make much better time than any surface ship can make or than the men could going by rail.

Mr. DILL. They could not make any better time than a big airplane.

Mr. HALE. A certain number of officers or men could be sent, for instance, to Honolulu. I think, as the Senator said, one of the principal reasons for keeping them up is that unless the Navy builds them no one else will. Other countries are experimenting with them and the Navy has a feeling that we are justified in building a small number ourselves. So far as the expenditures this year are concerned, we have already started with the second ship, and it would not do to let it go by the board.

Mr. DILL. Am I to understand that the appropriation of $1,450,000 is to be used to build another one of these great airships?

Mr. HALE. No; it is to complete the second ship now building. This is simply to complete the second ship.

Mr. DILL. The Senator knows that under all of the most favorable conditions that the officers can find, without an enemy on earth, it is extremely difficult and hazardous to handle these great ships now. If we had to think in terms of handling them with enemies around us, there would be only one safe thing to do, and that would be to put them in the hangar and keep them there so they would not be destroyed and to camouflage the hangar in the hope that it might not be seen by the enemy.

Mr. HALE. We are under contract to finish the ship now building.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator if any of the large appropriation found on page 41 is to be employed in the construction of airships which have not yet been laid down or for which contracts have not been made?

Mr. HALE. No; not at all.

Mr. KING. May I ask again, because I did not quite understand the reply to the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Washington, what is to become of the $1,450,000 carried as one of the items in the bill?

Mr. HALE. That is to complete the rigid airship now building, the sister ship of the Akron.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator assure the Senate that no part of this appropriation is to be employed in starting new ships or making contracts for new ships?

Mr. HALE. Oh, absolutely. It could not be done. There is no authorization for new ships.

Mr. KING. Is it the policy of the Navy to continue what I regard as a most unsound and wasteful policy in the constructiton of these ships?

Mr. HALE. I do not think they have any intention of asking for anything of the sort in the immediate future. I think we will get along with the two we now have.

Mr. KING. I think the experience we have had with the ships we have, the one we got from Italy and the one from England and the ones we have had built here, furnishes convincing evidence of the folly of taxing the American people to build these foolish toys which float around in the air and are of no service either in peace or warfare as demonstrated up to this time. If we were not under contract to complete this airship, I should move to strike out the $1,450,000. I think it is the most unfortunate venture that our Government has entered upon.

Mr. HALE. We could not very well strike it out. We are under contract.

Mr. KING. Yes; I understand. I said if we were not under contract, I should move to strike it out because I think the policy upon which we have embarked has not been justified by our experience and has not been justified by the experiences of other nations. Unfortunately, as the Senator knows, the Navy is just like a young boy who finds some other boy with a toy. Immediately we have to get one like it. Whenever Great Britain or Germany advances some new idea with respect to military or naval matters, immediately our Navy runs after the toy whether it is good, bad, or indifferent. This is a toy that has cost us perhaps $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 up to this time with absolutely no advantage, and the Senator admits that one of the ships is about to be put out of commission.

Mr. HALE. That is being done for purposes of economy.

Mr. KING. When we put ships out of commission they usually stay out of commission and the moths step in to eat them away.

Mr. HALE. The Los Angeles has been in commission for a considerable number of years.

Mr. KING. The Senator has been unable to explain any benefits that we have derived from the Los Angeles.

Mr. HALE. I am not very enthusiastic about this type of airship myself.

Mr. KING. If it were not subject to a point of order, I should offer an amendment forbidding the construction of any other airship under the authorization contained in the law of June 24, 1927.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Naval Academy," on page 42, after line 15, to strike out:

For pay of employees at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy, $577,387.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of employees, $577,387: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV(b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $236,000.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. I note from the report that the sum of $20,000 has been subtracted from the expenses of three various training stations, and the entire amount has been put to the credit of the single naval training station at Newport, R. I. How did that happen?

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that the question of keeping up the training station at Newport, R. I., was discussed in the House and by the House committee, and they decided to give it up as an active training station this year, but they proposed to spend $180,000 for keeping up the buildings and keeping them in repair.

Mr. GLASS. Why should that amount be subtracted from the three remaining stations?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me to finish my explanation, he will understand. When the question came over here the Senate committee did not believe it was advisable to give up Newport as a training station, but did not want to increase the amount to be expended under this item for training stations. Therefore, they took a small amount away from each of the other three stations, and added that to the Newport item, which will enable the department to keep up that station as a training station during the coming year. A good deal of the expense in connection with these matters——

Mr. GLASS. In other words, at the expense of the real training stations a training station is to be maintained that the House wanted to abolish?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the case of these appropriations the bulk of the expense is for keeping up the grounds and buildings, and keeping the stations in repair. The committee thought that, by extreme economy in the case of all these stations, they could cut the amounts of money for these stations without closing up any of the training stations. The one at Newport is the only training station in that section of the country.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it seems to me like a distinct discrimination. I am asking the question because my colleague [Mr. SWANSON], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in fact the ranking Democratic member of that committee, is in Europe upon Government business. He usually has looked after these details; and on its face it seems to me to be a discrimination that ought not to have been permitted.

Mr. HALE. We took the action with the idea that the Navy Department could keep all the stations going, though it cuts the Newport item down very much below the Budget figures which were estimated for this year.

Mr. GLASS. I understand that; but it does not seem to me to be a sound proposition to cut down the appropriation for training stations that are actually required for the Government service and to appropriate the entire amount thus supposed to be saved for a training station that is not of actual use to the Government.

Mr. HALE. It will not cut down their activities in the work of training men at all. It is simply a question of cutting down the amount spent for repairs and improvements during the year, and I think they can very well get along with the appropriation provided.

Mr. GLASS. What I mean to say is that if my colleague had been present it would not have been done. I am rather helpless about it.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator is right in that statement.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from Maine will correct me if I am in error, but it is my understanding that the appropriation for the Newport training station has been reduced by the economy program something like 60 per cent, whereas the appropriations for the other training stations have been reduced, I think, in each case not more than 10 or 15 per cent.

The Senator from Virginia referred to the Newport training station as one which is not for training purposes at all. Of course, that is far from the fact. It has been for many years a training station.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, does the Senator say that I said it was not a training station?

Mr. HEBERT. No; the Senator from Virginia made the statement.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the Senator from Virginia did not make any such statement as that.

Mr. HEBERT. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. I did not say it was not a training station at all; but, to my actual knowledge, for the last six or eight years there has been a controversy at every session of Congress as to whether or not it was a useful training station and whether or not it should be abolished altogether.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I know there has been agitation on the part of those interested in other training stations to have the one at Newport abolished.

Mr. GLASS. No; as a matter of fact, it is those who are interested in other training stations who have agreed with the advocates of the Newport (R. I.) station to retain that station.

Mr. HEBERT. The fact is that the proposed decrease in the appropriation for the naval training station would be a waste rather than a saving. Bear in mind that the training station at Newport is not that alone but is connected with the activities of the war college there and provides many facilities for the operations of the war college. If it were now discontinued, the cost of its maintenance would be greater than it would be to have it go along as a training station. It serves for the training of members of the Navy coming from a number of States in that section of the country. If it is to be discontinued as a training station, it will cost more for additional transportation to Hampton Roads or to one of the other stations than it would cost to maintain it as it has been maintained.

This bill now adds but $20,000 to the sum which is provided in the House bill, and that amount will enable Newport to continue training young men coming from that part of the country and at a saving of expense to the Government. Surely there ought not to be any objection to that little mite being added to the provision made for the training station in Newport.

Mr. GLASS. My objection is that it is a saving at the expense of a real training station, the efficiency of which has never been brought in question.

I do not propose to go into the merits of the matter here, although I may say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Rhode Island training station has been regarded by those who for the last six or eight years have sought to abolish it as simply one of the facilities of a fashionable resort. What I am objecting to is taking $20,000 from other training stations in order to maintain a training station as to the need for which there is question.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the naval training station at Newport I consider one of the most efficient if not the most desirable of any now in existence.

Mr. GLASS. Naturally the Senator would take that attitude.

Mr. HEBERT. Far from being the adjunct to a fashionable water resort, I wish the Senator from Virginia were privileged to visit it some time and see the work that is being done there, as I have been privileged to do.

Mr. GLASS. I am not fashionable enough to get there.

Mr. HEBERT. It is an excellent activity that has been wonderfully well managed, and it is excellently designed for the purpose for which it was intended. There are those in that part of the country, Mr. President, who have a deep interest in naval affairs. There is no harbor on the Atlantic seaboard which, to my mind, compares with that at Newport.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator needs to readjust his mind. The one at Norfolk is vastly superior to that at Newport.

Mr. HEBERT. Of course, I know the Senator from Virginia and I would not agree on that point.

Mr. GLASS. Never in the world.

Mr. HEBERT. But we may agree to disagree, of course.

Mr. GLASS. I confess my ineptitude when it comes to looking after matters of this kind. I am a little surprised, however, that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee should have on this matter deserted his colleague who is absent in Europe.

Mr. HALE. I do not think I have really deserted my colleague from Virginia. The fact of the matter is that the Hampton Roads station was cut only $4,000 below the appropriation for last year; the San Diego station was cut $23,700; the Newport station $89,000, and the Great Lakes station $22,100. So I do not think the Hampton Roads station will be in very bad condition when we take away $6,000 or $7,000 from it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before we leave this item I should like to inquire of the Senator how many training stations there are; how many recruits there are, if that is the proper term, at each of these stations; what the aggregate cost of all the stations is, and what are the advantages of them?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, to take up the Senator's last question first, the principal advantage is that unless we have them we can not train our men. All men when they enlist in the Navy have to go through a period of training for about three months in these training stations before they can become regular ordinary seamen. There are four of these stations in the United States—one at San Diego, one on the Great Lakes, one at Newport, and one at Hampton Roads. These stations cover all sections of the country. So far as possible, in recruiting an effort is made to recruit near the respective stations, because by doing so money is saved on the transportation of the men. If the Newport station were abandoned, it would mean that men who enlist in the Navy from anywhere in the New England section of the country either would have to be sent to Hampton Roads or to the Great Lakes; and in all probability, instead of the Navy getting enlistments from New England and the northern section of the country, it would accept applicants nearer to the other stations. We who live in the New England section are a seafaring people, and we are very much interested naturally in having the training station at Newport maintained. There is no very great saving to the Government involved.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am directed by the Finance Committee to report adversely the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, and I submit a report (No. 834) thereon.

I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall call up the bill for consideration. I understand the Senator from Oklahoma does not desire that it shall be taken up to-day.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill just reported is what is known as the bonus bill. This bill reached the Senate on yesterday and was referred to the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance met this morning at 9.30 and considered the bill until approximately 11 o'clock. At that time a vote was taken, with 14 members present, and 12 voted to report the bill adversely and 2 voted for the measure. So the bill just reported by the distinguished chairman of the committee and now upon the calendar has an adverse report, with 12 members of the committee on record against it and only 2 in its favor.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a copy of the bill as reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Title V of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof three new sections, to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section, the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section, the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is made but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs, but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section, has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If at the time this section takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509, shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be isued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

SEC. 3. This act may be cited as the "Emergency Adjusted Compensation Act, 1932."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator if the committee before voting to report the bill did not ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he desired to be heard further or if any other persons who were in favor of the bill desired to be heard? I do not think that the Senator's statement implied a criticism of the committee——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In no sense did I criticize the committee. I compliment the committee for taking prompt action upon this measure; that is exactly what I desired, although I hoped for a favorable rather than an adverse report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will have to object at this time for the following reason: This bill was unknown as to its exact provisions until yesterday. The bill had to be forced from the committee in the House of Representatives by a rule which required 145 Members of the body to sign a petition asking that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. The petition was signed, and on Monday the bill was brought before the House for consideration. During its consideration by the House the bill was slightly amended, so that no one could have foretold the form of the bill until the House had perfected it, and that was done late on yesterday. So, prior to that time, the House Members could not know what the bill would contain, and, of course, the Senate Members likewise were in a similar state of mind. Therefore, Mr. President, it is unfair to take the bill up until the Members of this body have a chance to read it.

I want to secure action at the earliest possible date, but at the same time it must be done in order. The printed text of the bill did not reach the members of the committee until 10 o'clock this day. The bill is now before the Senate. Anyone interested can get a copy and see exactly what it provides. But having been in such a chaotic state until yesterday and having reached this body only this morning so that it could be read, I think it is a little bit unreasonable to take it up immediately for consideration. I myself at least want a chance to read it carefully.

Then, in the meantime, Mr. President, I desire to put some figures in the RECORD, for there is likewise confusion in that respect. I was granted every courtesy that I could ask for before the committee. I made my statement and a presentation of the subject. The Treasury Department was represented and made some representations; the Veterans' Administration was there and likewise made some representations. I found that there was some confusion as to the facts. This confusion should be eliminated; and I desire to put in the RECORD to-day, if I may, some facts that can not be questioned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Inasmuch as I was one of the two Senators who voted against the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to report the bill adversely, I do not wish any misinterpretation to be placed upon my attitude with regard to this bill. I felt that a measure as important as this one should not be given an adverse report to the Senate, because technically the question would come on the motion to postpone indefinitely; and I felt personally that the least the committee should have done was to have reported it without recommendation. I have reserved the right to determine my course with regard to the bill when the vote comes on its final disposition.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the present status is that the Senator prefers that the bill not be taken up for consideration to-day?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think it would be unreasonable to ask the Senate to consider the bill to-day, inasmuch as Senators have had no chance to read the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has been very fair in his statement. I think he appreciates, so far as I am concerned, that I shall vote against the passage of the bill, and I voted for its unfavorable report to the Senate; but I think the Senate ought to take action on it. If those who sponsor the legislation want it put off to-day, I think it ought to be put off to-day. If they want it put off next week, put it off next week; but has the Senator in mind that we might take it up to-morrow?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am perfectly willing to take it up just as soon as copies of the bill can be distributed and the Members can have a little time to consider the measure.

Mr. HARRISON. But right now, for the present, the Senator does not want to make any agreement to take it up definitely at any particular time?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am speaking only for myself. So far as I know, I am the only Member of the Senate favorable to this bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I do not quite get the force of the Senator's position, because yesterday he asked us to take up the bill and vote on it immediately.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No; the Senator is mistaken. On yesterday I asked unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the calendar without reference to the committee. I did that in order to get it where we could consider it; but I did not ask to take it up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DILL. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought the Senator wanted to take it up immediately.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I asked yesterday that the bill be referred to the calendar, so that it could be printed and could come before the Senate as a whole. Now it is before us; and I am making no complaint. I am sure the committee wants to dispose of the bill. I am sure the Senate wants to dispose of it. I want to dispose of it; and it is unfair to me to try to explain the bill when I have only had a chance to read it since yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator knows that we have no desire to force him to proceed with the bill before he is ready to do so. I spoke to him about it before I reported the bill, and he told me that he did not desire to have the bill considered to-day. Therefore I stated, in reporting it, that the Senator desired that, and therefore I would not ask unanimous consent to take it up at this time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am making no complaint against anyone; but I do think it is due to Members that they should have at least one day to read the bill and think about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has no objection to taking it up to-morrow, as I understand?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I want to get it up at the earliest possible date within reason; and to-morrow will suit me splendidly.

Mr. President, this bill is here upon a petition signed by more than two and a half million American citizens. I was present at the Capitol steps some months ago when this petition was delivered. It took several trucks to deliver the petition in favor of this bill. These two and a half million signatures come from every State. These two and a half million signatures represent four and a half million veterans of this Nation. These four and a half million veterans represent directly, with their families, their fathers and their mothers and their brothers and sisters and their wives and children, many millions of American citizens. This bill is before Congress because multiplied millions of American citizens have placed it here.

At the present time we have in our city some 20,000 American citizens who have come here in connection with this bill. Of course they want this bonus paid. Of course they need the money. If you do not think they do, cast your eyes upward upon the galleries.

Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD at this point some newspaper stories, because these stories can tell better than myself of the conditions that exist among some of our people to-day.

I will read first from an editorial carried only a day or two ago in one of the Washington papers, signed by Eleanor Patterson. This editorial is on the first page, under the heading "Bonus or Jobs." I read:

BONUS OR JOBS

When this country stumbled into the World War 4,000,000 young men came forward to help us out. We sent 2,000,000 overseas. Petted them, praised them, wept over them. Promised them that the world was theirs.

Well, they came back, these 2,000,000—what was left of them—some broken in body, some broken in spirit. Our Government gave them $60 apiece and turned the whole lot loose to reconstruct their lives, fight for the jobs the stay-at-homes had taken, and "rustle" for themselves. Some have been successful, but some have not. Some have fallen upon bitter times.

Is it not natural that these men, yanked up by the roots, sent to fight and suffer and die maybe in France, to help our Government in its hour of need, should turn to our Government now in their hour of bitter need?

General Glassford has been much abused for helping to shelter and feed these ragged, jobless, starved-out men. Glassford went to the District Commissioners, to Congress, and to the White House to ask for help to take care of these men. But the District Commissioners, Congress, and the White House could not make up their alleged minds. They did nothing.

General Glassford is our chief of police. It is his first obligation to keep order here. He will do it. He is also himself a war veteran. At West Point and as an officer of the Regular Army he was taught to take care of soldiers. He will do it.

ELEANOR PATTERSON.

I then find in the public press of date June 10 a news story published at Detroit and signed by George W. Welsh. It is under the title:

FELONS HOUSED BETTER THAN VETERANS—DESPITE THEIR MISERY, REFUSE TO BELIEVE CONGRESS WILL IGNORE THEM

By George W. Welsh, city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich.

DETROIT, June 10.—An hour with the "bonus army" in Washington in their cheerless camping ground is enough to convince the most heartless of their dire need.

I saw them the day they had staged their parade to the Capitol. I mingled with them in their camp on the banks of the Potomac.

Long after the parade had ended footsore, weary, and half-starved men were straggling back to the grounds. They stood in groups, dozed on the bare ground, and laid around smoldering fires where coffee pots boiled.

YET WERE CHEERFUL

Despite their misery, these men who had assembled from all parts of the country to put their plea before Congress and the President were cheerful.

They were cheered with the figment of hope the applause of Washington citizens had given them, cheered with their desperate refusal to believe Congress can ignore them and their buddies at home.

And these men accepted with pitiful gratitude the cigarettes I gave them. In the darkness they mistook me for one of their members.

"You sure must have been lucky," one vet said when I handed him a cigarette. "I did pretty well to-day, too. I got eight."

Once these men could have all the cigarettes they could smoke from admiring citizens. Now they exclaim: "Gee, buddy, you're a life-saver" when some one gives them one.

HAS UNDERESTIMATED THEM

If the Government believes its refusal to feed or hear these men in Washington will prevent others from coming, it has underestimated the guts of the average American.

Our worst felon, our most despicable criminal, is comfortably housed and fed. These men, sleeping in an open field, eating scraps from private charity, have committed only one "crime"—that of believing the Government should do something for them.

Then I have another article from the Washington Herald. It is under a flaming headline, as follows:

GHOSTS OF WAR-TIME GLORY PARADE IN DARKNESS

By Floyd Gibbons

Here is what he says:

I saw them march last night.

They were the men who won the war in '17 and '18 and were thrown into the discard in the battle of '29, '30, and '31.

In the old days—young and strong, well shod and equipped, well-fed, and received with open arms—they marched the length of Pennsylvania Avenue, past the Capitol and past the White House where Woodrow Wilson reviewed them.

In the light of day and the glory of youth and with prayers and hopes of the Nation pinned above their khaki-clad breasts, they marched that same route between thousands of proud and admiring public officials and civilians.

Mr. President, I am going to ask that the balance of this article be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

FORGOTTEN GHOSTS

Last night they marched in the dark like ghosts out of the forgotten past. Four abreast they marched—5,000 strong.

Few uniforms were shown and those ragged and wear worn.

The grease-stained overalls of jobless factory workers.

The frayed straw hats of unemployed farm hands.

The shoddy elbow-patched garments of idle clerks.

All were down at the heel. All were slim and gaunt and their eyes had a light in them. There were empty sleeves and limping men with canes.

They were 5,000 hungry ghosts of the heroes of 1917. Not so young now. They came back triumphant from the smoke of battle in distant wars, only to go down in the battle of life with their own kind, their own people, their own Government, the Government they fought for.

MARCH IN DARK

They did not march in the light of day. They marched in darkness. The moving-picture record of the march of the 5,000 guests will be dim and obscure, if any at all.

That's why they marched at night, with their shoes worn thin and their boots run down at the heel. They marched without hats, many of them, because they have no hats. Many were without coats.

But they were clean shaven, every man of them. And the shirts they wore, though patched and torn and thin and cheap, were clean from their own washing.

And they marched proud and unashamed, carrying the flag they fought for. The flags were not carried on regular staffs. They were on makeshift pieces of patched wood. Some of the flags were carried proudly aloft on fresh-cut saplings from the river bottoms where these ghosts live.

You know how pitiful and abandoned a garment looks when it is nailed on an oar and floats above a raft as a signal of distress at sea.

That is how their flags looked last night.

That's how their clothing looked—and their gaunt, clean faces. Distress and abandonment.

They carried no flagrant banners. They marched silently as ghosts should.

WHITE HOUSE BAN

They were men of the old fighting First. They were the ragged remnants of Pershing's own. They were survivors from the glorious Second Division, from the Twenty-sixth and the Thirty-sixth and Forty-second and the Eighty-sixth and the Ninety-first—they were the ghosts of the A. E. F., the largest and greatest Army that ever marched under the American flag.

They marched in darkness last night.

They were not allowed to march past the Capitol this time, nor the office buildings of Congress. It would bring distress to the Congressmen.

They did not march past the White House last night. They were not allowed to. They would bring distress to the President of the richest Nation in the World.

They were allowed to march just around and past one corner of the great United States Treasury at the corner of Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue.

It also was dark.

Some said that President Hoover could, if so inclined, have seen the march of the 5,000 hungry ghosts from either the south portico or the upper windows of the White House. From those positions he could have seen them.

I hope he saw them march last night.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I gather that among the papers presented by the very energetic and patriotic Senator from Oklahoma, who has just addressed the Senate, is a paper from Detroit.

Mr. President, I greatly deplore that the paper from Detroit has been so imposed upon that advantage has been taken of the confidence of their excellent representative in such a manner that the paper has reported that a Member of the United States Senate, in the presence of other Senators joining with him, had announced as these men passed by that they were a lot of bums.

Of course, Mr. President, no Senator could ever have uttered such an expression. There is not a man on this floor, whatever may be his views on the bonus bill or any matter of legislation, who would not prefer to resign his seat from any public place than to have it known or said that in such place and as such representative he could have ever uttered such an expression.

I only interrupt my able friend at this point, since he read and brought to our attention the Detroit paper, in the hope that whoever imposed upon that paper, and took advantage of the representative of that paper, might either correct the slander and injustice he did the Senate, or what we are now saying at this time may reach the people around Detroit, that they may realize that such a statement published in the paper was a gross imposition upon the paper, and a horrid, inexcusable slander of any Senator of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, let me call attention to one or two facts in connection with this matter. These veterans paraded on Pennsylvania Avenue a few nights ago. The public press of this city is responsible for the statement that 100,000 Washingtonians, and those from this immediate vicinity, lined the street to see those boys march by. On a more recent occasion, I think night before last, another parade was held on Pennsylvania Avenue, and again 100,000 lined that famous thoroughfare to see the parade go by, which took almost two hours to pass. About the only applause during that parade was given when the remnant of this bonus brigade marched by.

Mr. President, some of these boys have been on their way to Washington for weeks, many of them have been on their way for more than a month, and since those veterans started from the far West to this city, more than a month ago, the public press has carried the statement that the President of the United States has been conferring with Mr. John Pierpont Morgan and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, around the dining table, presumably about how to protect the interests of bondholders in the financial metropolis of the world.

Claude Bowers is responsible for this information. In his editorial of May 14 he said:

> Not along ago Mr. Hoover spent an evening with John Pierpont Morgan at the dining table of a member of his Cabinet. This week he spent an evening with John D. Rockefeller at the dining table of another member of his Cabinet.

Mr. President, what are the conditions in the country to-day? Are the Senators aware of what is going on outside of the District of Columbia? I am frank to say that they do not act as if they are, and that is not an implied criticism; it is a statement of fact that I could not refrain from making.

The public press is full of what is going on throughout the country, and it comes from the highest authority. I will not read from some unknown newspaper correspondent, I will not read from some correspondent residing in some far Western State. Let me call the attention of the Senate and of the country to a statement made by Mr. Wickersham; and all, of course, know Mr. Wickersham. This statement appeared in the New York Times of June 12, 1932. These are the words of Mr. Wickersham:

> Business is prostrate; values of the most approved securities have faded into nothingness; real estate, still valued at figures of boom times for the purposes of taxation, is appraised for purposes of mortgaging or renewing mortgages at much less; everything is down except taxes and public expenditures.

Further I read:

> But even in the face of that condition, Congress refuses to eliminate unnecessary spending of public funds and busies itself in devising means for disbursing large sums by way of alms, or to meet the demands of organized bodies of voters.

Again I read:

> All recognize the fact that so long as men able and willing to work can not find employment they must be protected from want and starvation at public expense. But the way to reduce unemployment and want is not primarily through dependence upon public aid.

Mr. President, I heard it stated this morning that there was too much money in circulation. The statement was made before the Finance Committee by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that this country does not need more money in circulation. He left the plain inference that if we could get rid of some we have in circulation the country would be better off.

Mr. President, this bill to-day brings up the issue between those who think we have too much money in circulation and multiplied millions who have not seen a dollar for months.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have noticed from time to time a statement of the amount of money in circulation, but I think that anybody who reads such statements given out by the Treasury Department ought to distinguish between the money that is being held in the vaults of the banks and money that is in circulation among the people of the country. There may be a tremendous amount of money in the banks, but certainly no one can say that there is too much money in circulation among the people.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. At that point let me suggest to the Senator from Montana that it is not true that the banks are full of money. It is true that at this moment the 20,000 banks in the United States do not have in their vaults the sum of a billion dollars of actual money, although they have on deposit some $40,000,000,000 of credit money.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. What I was leading up to was that what the country needs more than anything else is that money be put into circulation among the people of the country, and unless something can be done to put money into circulation among the people of the country, then, as the Senator pointed out a short time ago, it should be apparent, and must be apparent, to everybody in the country that there must be a general repudiation of indebtedness, because of the fact that debts can not be paid off with the money that is at present in existence in the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me a moment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Touching the question of overcirculation of currency in the country, as testified to-day before the Finance Committee, it was but a few weeks ago that the Glass-Steagall bill was before this body. That met the approval of the administration and the very Treasury Department a representative of which just testified that there is ample circulation of currency in the country.

The purpose of that bill was to increase the circulation in the country. It was to increase it by billions of dollars. It was to give the banks, in addition to the eligible paper they have to-day, the use of bonds which they might place with the Federal reserve banks and get currency, which they might lend and distribute to the public.

The fact is that if there was a need of that currency at the time that bill passed, in the sum of billions of dollars, the need has not decreased, as shown by any evidence, but, on the contrary, has increased. I think the distinguished author of the bill, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who has just entered the Chamber, will state that the Glass bill, making available a large amount of additional currency for circulation in this country, has not been availed of to a great extent by the banks of the country. Would the Senator from Virginia mind answering that?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that upon my last inquiry it appeared that it had practically not been availed of at all. There had been one application for $46,000 out of the many billions of dollars that are being loaned.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I made the statement just a moment ago that the issue before the Senate and before the people of this country is between the folks who think we have too much money in circulation—that is, the bondholding creditor class—and, on the other side, those who think we have too little money in circulation—that is, the multiplied millions who belong to the debtor class.

The purpose of this bill is to pay the soldiers the amount due them, but the bill would have another effect. It would place additional money in circulation, the lack of which the Senator from Montana complains about, and that is the reason why the bondholder class and the banker class are against the legislation. It is the reason which permeates some of those in places of high authority to oppose the payment to the amounts due the veterans.

Mr. President, from this morning's mail I have picked out three letters, and I want to read a paragraph from each of them, to show what the people of the country think about this question of money in circulation. Do the people think that the banks are full of money? Perhaps they do, and if they do they must wonder why they can not borrow from the banks. To show what the people think in some sections, I quote first from a letter from a prominent lawyer of Ardmore, Okla.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, before the Senator gets to that, I know the Senator has given a great deal of thought to this matter, and I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. A statement has been made to the effect that if we paid the bonus to the veterans by issuing currency, that currency would immediately depreciate in value by 20 per cent. What has the Senator to say with reference to that?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if we should go into the philosophy and economics of the money question, of course, it would take some time. It is admitted by every economist with whom I am in touch—and I am in touch with many—that placing $2,000,000,000 in circulation would have the effect of making money more plentiful, and thereby cheaper, and as money comes down in value, commodity prices would go up.

Those who oppose the bill contend that if we put $2,000,000,000 in circulation, money will go down to such a low degree of value that commodity prices will go up beyond all reason. That is the reason they assign for being against the bonus bill, that it would make money so cheap it would be worthless. Where there is one person in the United States who believes in that philosophy, there are tens of thousands who would like to see a little of this too-cheap money.

Reading from the letter to which I have just referred, a letter dated June 15 and coming from a State 1,500 miles away:

> Unless Congress can in some way increase the money in the United States and fix it so that money is not so dear, this panic will continue and times will grow worse and you can imagine what the consequence will be. It is necessary that more money be put in circulation, for you know that when money gets so precious that people will not give up their money for anything else in the world, that money is too high.

I read from another letter coming from the same far Western State, as follows:

> There is no money in circulation, notwithstanding the statements of the Government to the contrary; and nobody but a boob thinks that the average man is hoarding money. The average man has no money at all, and has no means of acquiring any worth mentioning. He can not even pay his taxes, much less the interest on his debts. Most of the farms in this country did not produce rents in sufficient quantities in 1931 to pay the taxes, the ad valorem taxes levied under the State law. Some farms did not produce enough of products to pay the ad valorem taxes, although all of them were sold and applied to such obligation. No one has any security which he can put up for a loan, even if the banker were willing to make the loan, which he is not, and you can not blame him, for he can see no security in anything. * * * Just how long are we going to continue to dangle from the lower end of the financial roof I am unable to conjecture, but this one thing I believe: If we are not cut down some time very soon, then it is going to be woe to the financial pirates and buccaneers who hung us there.

That letter did not come from a bum or a thug or a red or a communist.

I read from another letter written on Sunday, and I read this letter because I was requested to do so:

> Tell those "birds," the wise ones—

I do not know to whom he refers when he mentions "those birds, the wise ones." The record can speak for itself.

> Tell those "birds," the wise ones, that bats and owls will begin roosting in the large buildings of their cities if the farm and ranch products do not come back so they will bring enough to pay the cost of production.

Mr. President, the citizens of our common country who have their wealth in multiplied millions invested in tax-exempt securities who to-day want to see the dollar made more valuable, when it is already worth $2.03, measured by farm commodities, and already worth $1.53 measured by the wholesale list—these citizens, if they do not yield and evince some kind of willingness to have the situation solved, will learn that it may not be long until their tax-exempt securities, worth $2.03 per dollar of farm commodities and $1.53 per dollar according to the wholesale list, may be worth no more than the toilet paper in the bathrooms of their mansions.

Mr. President, how can the people pay the massed debts of the Nation with the dollar at the present buying power? I invite the attention of the Senate and the country to a statement just released by a large brokerage firm operating throughout the country. This brokerage firm is under the name of Goodbody & Co. The date of the release is June 3, 1932, and I read the first paragraph as follows:

> On all fronts, business has been retreating for the past two months.

What does that mean? Does it mean that times are getting better? No! Does it mean the depression has been checked? No! It means that times are getting worse.

> On all fronts business has been retreating for the past two months. Likewise, the commodity-price structure with few exceptions has reached new lows for the depression.

Again I read from the same document:

> It has been roughly estimated that in 1929 the total indebtedness in the United States was $214,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I want to reread that statement. Here is a large brokerage house operating throughout the country, with many statisticians, with many economists, having facilities to ascertain the amount of the massed debts for the country, making the statement that in 1929 the total indebtedness in the United States was $214,000,000,000. Let me read that again:

> It has been roughly estimated that in 1929 the total indebtedness in the United States was $214,000,000,000, and that it is now $180,000,000,000. The latter amount—both totals exclude book credits, loans between individuals, pawnbrokers' loans, etc.—represents an increase in our real debt (as measured in terms of commodity prices) of 30 per cent compared with 1929.

Mr. President, where are the people going to get the money to pay these debts? Where is the farmer going to get the money to pay his taxes, to pay his interest, to pay his farm mortgage? Where is the business man to get the money to pay his interest and his taxes and his debts? Where are the school districts and the townships and the cities and the counties and the States to get the money with which to meet their obligations? They must get the money from the taxpayers. The taxpayers have not the money. Under present prices farmers can not get enough money to pay their taxes; they can not get enough money to pay their interest. Their interest is going in default daily. If the taxes are not paid, interest on those loans will go into default, and it will be only a short time until the bonds themselves will be in default.

That is the reason why I said a moment ago that the fortunate individuals—they think they are fortunate—who hold the tax-exempt securities and other forms of securities in the vast mass of $214,000,000,000 may not be so fortunate after all. If the people can not pay the interest, the bondholders will not collect the interest. If the people can not pay their taxes, the municipalities which issued the bonds likewise can not pay either the interest or the principal, and what will happen? The interest on the bonds will be in default, and it will be only a very short time until the bonds themselves will be in default. When that time comes what will the bonds be worth? We are facing to-day the question of defaulting and the question of repudiation, and yet the Treasury Department says that we have too much money in circulation.

Mr. President, the depression has been coming on the country for a long time. Of course, it broke in 1929 rather suddenly. At that time we hoped it would not last long. When I returned to the Senate in the fall of 1930, now almost two years ago, I thought I foresaw what was coming. The moment I reached the Senate in the session in December, 1930, I prepared a resolution and introduced it, asking for the creation of a special committee to consider the depression. I read that resolution. It is Senate Resolution 338, Seventy-first Congress, third session, and is as follows:

Resolved, That a special select committee on emergency and relief legislation be, and is hereby, created; such committee to consist of 11 members to be appointed by the President of the Senate, as follows: 6 members from the majority party and 5 members from the minority party.

Immediately upon appointment the members shall meet and organize such committee and, when organized, said committee shall have power coequal with regular Senate committees and shall have jurisdiction of emergency and special relief legislation, including proposals for the authorization of appropriations.

When organized such committee shall report to the Senate its plan of organization and location.

When that resolution was introduced I took occasion to make some short speeches in behalf of the resolution, and finally I got a vote. When we were about ready to vote we were advised by Members on the floor of the Senate that there was no depression. We have been here now almost two years since that time, and I am sorry to admit that some of the dignified and distinguished Members of this body have not yet learned that we have a depression confronting this country of ours.

Mr. President, I read awhile ago from a newspaper report relative to the conditions that exist in the country. I desire at this point to call attention to some statements made by a distinguished mayor of one of our leading cities. A few days ago a group of mayors, representing cities totaling populations running into many millions, came to Washington asking for relief for their cities. Among these mayors was the distinguished Mr. Curley from Boston. I have a signed statement prepared by Kenneth Clark, and from the statement I quote some of the statements alleged to have been made by Mayor Curley.

Speaking of the veterans, Mayor Curley declared:

"When you find sane and intelligent men discussing revolt and considering it in the National Capital, it is time the Government acted. The sooner the Government acts the better for the country—and the action must come quickly.

"If the Government does not do something for the boys who are here, Congress will have starving women and children here at the next session."

Those are not my statements. Those are the statements made by the distinguished mayor of one of the most important cities of the Nation, the mayor of the city of Boston. I quote him further:

We seem to be obsessed with the fear of going off the gold standard.

There is something far more important to-day than the gold standard.

It is the American people. We must no longer tolerate misery and suffering because millions of our people, though begging for work, can not find jobs.

Again I quote this distinguished mayor:

In this emergency the Federal Government must set the example on a colossal scale and fire the imagination of the people. It must convince the people that prosperity has not forsaken us. It must provide work. That's the only way the psychology of fear can be banished.

The $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan would enable the Government to undertake major building projects all over the country. Commerce, industry, business would respond at once. People now idle would go back to work.

There would be a great demand for materials—steel, lumber, machinery, all the basic commodities. Factories would reopen to turn out these materials.

Not only would there be employment for those without jobs, but business for the railroads, steamships, the construction industry, for a multitude of various industries would be provided.

Starting up the wheels of industry would stimulate trade for retail and wholesale establishments. Not a section of the country but would benefit in supplying the needs of the people who are at present unable to purchase commodities that are necessary to their welfare and happiness.

Mr. President, I next call attention to some statements made by another distinguished American citizen, who happens to be one of the famous editors of the country and whose name is Arthur Brisbane. In a recent editorial Mr. Brisbane said:

If anything breaks loose in this country, which kind Heaven forbid, gentlemen whose motto is, "Billions for high finance, but not a dollar for soldiers," may do some mournful regretting.

Since it is not possible to supply the men with jobs, with the national intelligence temporarily paralyzed, how can anybody deny that the next best thing would be to give the soldiers their bonus, which will have to be paid to them anyhow? What the country needs is not money in hundreds of millions put away in bank vaults, but money scattered all over the country as water is scattered in irrigating a ranch. The country needs money that will be spent, not accumulated.

Anyway, is it necessary for the Government first to sell bonds to bankers, pay interest on the bonds, then take the money and give it to the soldiers? Why not print the money and give it to them direct? The only value that the money has is the name of the Government on the bills.

Only a fool would talk about inflation, since this money would be spent in every corner of every State in the Union, absorbed like water applied to the roots of trees, grass, and bushes, spent in retail stores everywhere.

We need to start business moving.

Would not the spending of $2,000,000,000 by 3,000,000 men, all over the country, start everything moving? Wouldn't they buy shoes, hats, and overcoats, pay their bills at grocery stores, pay something on account to keep from losing their homes? Wouldn't they order many new automobiles?

This country is starving for money spent, just as a farm with no rainfall starves for water. But foolish minds that represent Uncle Sam think the way to end a drought is to put water in reservoirs and keep it there. They are wrong. The way to attend to a drought is to scatter water.

The way to attend to a depression is to scatter money. We recently found a couple of billions of it for financial institutions, and as Mr. Coolidge points out, we found ten billions of it quickly for foreign countries. Why would it wreck this country if now we found two billion four hundred million for the soldiers to whom that money must be paid eventually anyhow?

Mr. President, a short time ago the Federal Reserve Board announced to the country that it was going to try to bring to an end the depression. It announced it was going to bring it to an end through making money more plentiful. It announced that it was going to exercise power under the Federal reserve act, through open-market operations, of taking money from the Treasury and placing it in circulation. The plan was and is to do that through the purchase of Government bonds. Under the present Federal reserve act the Federal reserve banks have the power to buy outstanding existing Government bonds and to pay for those bonds with Federal reserve money. This was the plan suggested by the Federal Reserve Board for bringing an end to the present depression by placing more money in circulation.

Well, Mr. President, at the beginning of this calendar year, we had in circulation $5,646,000,000. The Federal Reserve Board initiated a program of making money more plentiful.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, a number of reports from the Federal Reserve Board showing exactly what the board has done during each week from April 7 until the present time. According to the report submitted on April 7 the several Federal reserve banks had bought during the preceding week—that is during the week ending April 7—$13,000,000 worth of outstanding Government bonds and paid for those bonds with Federal reserve notes taken from the vaults of the Treasury.

Mr. President, during the next week, that is, from April 7 to April 14, the Federal Reserve Board purchased $100,000,000 worth of outstanding Government bonds, paying for those bonds with new, crisp Federal reserve money.

At the time the board started to buy bonds there was in circulation the sum of $5,646,000,000. That is all the money there was outside the Treasury—$5,646,000,000. After the board had bought $100,000,000 in bonds during the week ending April 14 we find the circulation since January 1 had decreased $223,000,000; in other words, despite the fact that the board was buying bonds and paying for those bonds with money, and placing that money in circulation, the amount of money in circulation from week to week was decreasing. What does that mean, Mr. President? It means but one thing, that the banks were selling their bonds to the Federal reserve system, and that as soon as the banks had sold some bonds and had received the money for them they took the money which they had thus received and sent it back to the Federal reserve system to apply on their outstanding obligations.

In the third week of April, under the Federal reserve plan of open-market operations, the board bought $93,000,000 of outstanding bonds, and after the board had added such sum to the circulation the decline continued.

In the week ending April 23 the board bought $113,000,000 worth of outstanding Government bonds, paying for them in Federal reserve notes.

In the week ending May 5 the board bought $96,000,000 of outstanding Government bonds, paying for them with Federal reserve notes.

In the week ending May 12 the board brought $98,000,000 of outstanding bonds and paid for those bonds with Federal reserve notes from the United States Treasury. They are printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, taken down to the Treasury, by the Treasury turned over to the Federal reserve system, and distributed among the reserve banks of the country. So it is actually true that these notes come from the United States Treasury.

During the week ending May 19 the board bought $81,000,000 of outstanding bonds and paid for them in the same way.

During the week ending May 26 the board bought $59,000,000 of outstanding bonds and paid for them with Federal reserve notes;

During the week ending June 2 the board purchased $50,000,000 worth of outstanding bonds and paid for them with Federal reserve notes; and

During the week ending last Thursday, June 9, the report shows the board purchased $70,000,000 of these bonds and paid for them with Federal reserve notes.

Mr. President, if you add the number of bonds that the board has bought, you will find that they have purchased some $900,000,000 of outstanding Government bonds, and they have paid for those bonds with Federal reserve notes, but, notwithstanding the fact that the board bought bonds and placed some $900,000,000 of new money in circulation, the actual circulation has decreased to the extent of $194,000,000.

In other words, while the board has placed in circulation $900,000,000 of new money, the member banks have taken this money and sent it back to the Federal reserve banks and paid their loans, and to-day, after three months of this operation, the amount of money in circulation is $194,000,000 less than it was the first of this year. Then some Senators and many others wonder why it is that commodity prices are going down and down and the buying power of the dollar is going up and up.

Mr. President, the same economic law that governs the price of wheat, that governs the price of corn, that governs the price of cotton, that governs the price of oil, that governs the price of cattle, likewise controls and governs the price of money. When money is plentiful money is cheap; when money is scarce money is dear; and the policy of the Federal Reserve Board during the past few months has been to make money scarce and thereby make money dear.

The one great effect of the passage of this bonus bill will be to place more money in circulation, to make money more plentiful, to make the money cheaper, and as money comes down commodity prices will go up. That is why so many people throughout the country are in favor of the passage of the bonus bill, not only to pay the soldiers, but because it is believed that the passage of this bill and the placing of this new money in circulation will help the country's non-soldier population more even than it will help the soldiers themselves.

Mr. President, let me give an illustration. Suppose an old farmer in some far Western State has 160 acres of land; suppose on that land he has in his granary a thousand bushels of wheat that to-day is selling for 26 cents a bushel to the farmer; suppose he has in the warehouse or in his barn 10 bales of cotton, to-day selling for less than 5 cents a pound; suppose he has some hogs, to-day selling at $2.35 a hundred, and cattle at the same ratio, and suppose that this old farmer has a son, a veteran of the World War. The son perchance has a certificate for $1,000. He has borrowed $500 on his certificate and only has $500 left; but the bonus bill passes. The only help the boy, the veteran, gets is to receive $500, but it is my contention that the father, the farmer, will receive a benefit far in excess of that received by the son. If my contention is correct, by the placing of this money in circulation money will be made cheaper, thereby increasing commodity prices; and if that happens—and economists claim it will—then the old farmer in this far Western State having corn and wheat and cotton and cattle and hogs, if commodity prices increase, will get, perchance, a dollar for his wheat—an increase of four times its present price—he will get, perchance, 10 cents for his cotton, an increase of more than double the present price; he will get, perchance, 6 cents for his hogs, an increase of three times; he will get double for his cattle; and so the old farmer in this far Western State, if this bonus bill shall pass, will be the real beneficiary of the act.

If that happens, it will happen to all farmers. If it happens to all farmers, what will be the effect upon the country? With buying power reinvested in the great farm population, they will have some money with which to buy. The soldiers will have their money, of course, and they will spend the money in paying their debts. Every dollar that the soldier receives through this bill will begin to pay debts immediately, and every dollar will perchance pay $50 worth of debts; and if this bill is passed, carrying the sum of $2,000,000,000, and each dollar pays $50 of debts, the enactment of the bill has the possibilities of causing to be liquidated $100,000,000,000 of the massed debts resting upon the people of the Nation.

That is why I am for this bill. I am for the bill because the soldiers want it. I am for the bill because the soldiers need it. I am for the bill because we have committed ourselves that we owe them the money. I am for the bill because it will help the unemployed, because it will help the farmer, because it will help the stock raiser, because it will help the miner, and because it will help the little merchant and the larger merchant, because it will help the wholesaler, because it will help the factory, because it will help the railroads, because it will help the banks, and because it will help the Nation.

Mr. President, I will not now take more of the time of the Senate. Before this bill comes before the Senate for a vote I hope the Members will take occasion to read it and it will have some further discussion.

As I see the matter, it is the only plan pending before the Senate, the only plan pending before the Congress, that has any chance of passage that will be of any benefit whatever to the people of this country. It is not a benefit alone to the soldiers. If my analysis of conditions is correct, unless the masses of the people, made up of soldiers and unemployed and wage earners and farmers and business men, making up a mass of more than 100,000,000 of our people, can get back on their feet and have some money, the big banks in New York can not prosper; the big trunk-line railroads can not prosper; and the big life-insurance companies can not prosper. But if something can be done to help the man at the bottom and give him some buying power, immediately, the depression will be checked and very shortly better times will be enjoyed by all.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3847) to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 42, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kendrick	Reed
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Dale	King	Robinson, Ind.
Blaine	Davis	La Follette	Schall
Borah	Dill	Lewis	Sheppard
Bratton	Fletcher	McGill	Smoot
Brookhart	Frazier	McNary	Steiwer
Broussard	George	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Glass	Moses	Townsend
Capper	Hale	Neely	Trammell
Caraway	Harrison	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Carey	Hayden	Norris	Wagner
Cohen	Hebert	Nye	Walcott
Connally	Johnson	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Jones	Patterson	Watson
Costigan	Kean	Pittman	Wheeler

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 43, line 6, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "and," and in line 7, after the word "purposes," to insert "and engraving of trophies and badges," so as to read:

Current and miscellaneous expenses, Naval Academy: For text and reference books for use of instructors; stationery, blank books and forms, models, maps, and periodicals; apparatus and materials for instruction in physical training and athletics; expenses of lectures and entertainments, not exceeding $1,000, including pay and expenses of lecturer; chemicals, philosophical apparatus and instruments, stores, machinery, tools, fittings, apparatus, materials for instruction purposes, and engraving of trophies and badges, $68,800; for purchase, binding, and repair of books for the library (to be purchased in the open market on the written order of the superintendent), $5,000; for expenses of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, $1,400; for contingencies for the superintendent of the academy, to be expended in his discretion, not exceeding $3,500; for contingencies for the commandant of midshipmen, to be expended in his discretion, not exceeding $1,000; in all, $79,700, to be accounted for as one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Marine Corps, pay, Marine Corps," on page 44, line 23, after the figures "$3,602,277," to insert "together with $129,101 of the unexpended balance of 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1932,' and on page 45, line 2, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$122,018" and insert "$138,148," so as to read:

Pay of officers, active list: For pay and allowances prescribed by law for all officers on the active list—pay and allowances, $3,602,277, together with $129,101 of the unexpended balance of "Pay, Marine Corps, 1932," including not to exceed $138,148 for increased pay for making aerial flights; subsistence allowance, $493,116; rental allowance, $643,063; in all, $4, 43,456; and no part of such sum shall be available to pay active duty pay and allowances to officers on the retired list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Maine if this $129,000 was an overappropriation for the preceding year; and if so, why is it reappropriated? Why was it not covered into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HALE. This is the reappropriation of an unexpended balance not used last year. The reason for reappropriating it is that under the amount provided in the House bill for the pay of the officers and men of the Marine Corps it will be necessary either to cut down the number of officers—and there is no way of getting rid of officers except under the provisions of law—or to cut down the number of men, which was not intended by the House. To rectify that we have simply reappropriated from the unexpended balances of last year enough to take care of the matter, so that the officers will be left as they are now and the men will not have to be reduced below 15,300.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the explanation made by the Senator may be a valid one, but it does not yet appeal to me. I ask the Senator again if this $129,101 which was appropriated last year has been or will be expended under the provisions of the appropriation bill carrying the appropriation?

Mr. HALE. Under last year's bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no! This is the unexpended balance from last year.

Mr. KING. Then there is a balance?

Mr. HALE. Yes; there is a balance.

Mr. KING. Why should not that balance, then, be covered into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HALE. There is a later provision to be offered in the bill covering into the Treasury of the United States all balances that are not specifically allowed to be carried over.

Mr. KING. But it is intended that this shall not go into the Treasury, but is a reappropriation?

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes. We are not adding anything at all to the bill, but are simply taking from last year's appropriation that was not expended enough to take care of this matter, so that we can have the same number of officers in the Marine Corps that we have now, and so that it will not be necessary to reduce the men. I do not think anyone would want to do that.

Mr. KING. I confess that the methods employed are not very clear to me. When appropriations are made for a given year—that is, for the next fiscal year—they are presumably made upon Budget estimates and upon the requirements of the various activities of the Government for which appropriations are made. If, however, through economies, or because of mistakes made in asking for a larger appropriation than was absolutely necessary, at the end of the year there is a balance unexpended, I think it should be covered into the Treasury; but we are in the habit of having these unexpended balances consumed either by some legerdemain or by a reappropriation, so that there are no balances returned to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the Marine Corps this year there was an estimated unexpended balance, under "Pay," of about a million dollars, and about $200,000 under general expenses. Out of the twelve hundred thousand we are taking only two hundred and twenty-nine thousand, which takes care of pay of officers and men. So that there will be over a million left in the unexpended balance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my view, it leads to extravagance and to waste. It seems to me that automatically at the end of the fiscal year whatever has not been expended for the purpose for which an appropriation is made should be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and the estimates which are made for the next fiscal year should not take into account any unexpended balance. Indeed, the Budget estimate did not take into account, I fancy, any unexpended amount, but took into account the recommendations made by the various officers or departments, and the President of the United States, when we met in December, sent his Budget estimates with his recommendations to the Congress.

Those Budget estimates did not contemplate that there would be $129,000 of an unexpended balance which might be resorted to in order to meet a part of the expenses of the Navy for the coming year, and I object to this policy of having these unexpended balances reappropriated. They ought to go into the Treasury of the United States, and that would compel the representatives of the Government, in presenting their recommendations to the Budget committee, and the Budget committee, in preparing its budget for the President, to take into account the needs only of the respective departments and bureaus, and not permit them to count upon any unexpended balances, or contemplate that unexpended balances should be reappropriated in order to augment the appropriations and the expenditures for the coming year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think in the main I would agree with the Senator that ordinarily that would be advisable, but in this particular case it is to rectify something that is necessary, unless we are to find ourselves in the position where we are going to have to cut down the enlisted men of the Marine Corps.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not complaining in this particular instance of the amount required for the marines. I am complaining of a policy which permits balances to be reappropriated. I think an unexpended balance should go into the Treasury, and I think the departments and bureaus which want money for the next fiscal year should be compelled to go before the Budget committee and present their case, and the Budget committee then determine what is required, and not permit them to resort to unexpended balances to swell the amounts which may be recommended by the President of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator will find very little of that in the bill. The only other places where we have done it is in the case of the enlisted men of the marines, and in one case of an appropriation for fuel, where $150,000 was appropriated for this year to get the Scouting Fleet back from the Pacific. The fleet has stayed out there and that money is not to be used, and they want that unexpended balance to be reappropriated, so that when the fleet does come back, the money will be there.

Mr. KING. I will say that my good friend from Maine and the Naval Affairs Committee are not the chief offenders, by any means, in this policy of reappropriating unexpended balances. But I think it is a meretricious policy, one which ought to be condemned, and one which the Congress ought not to tolerate. When the naval affairs appropriation bill was before the Committee on Appropriations, if they found that the Budget estimates were not sufficiently large, and that they needed $128,000, they should have included that as a direct appropriation, and not a reappropriation. Then the books of the Treasury could be properly balanced; the accounts could be in an intelligible form, and one not versed in the intricacies of Federal accounting could, by reading the balance sheets, determine just the appropriations for each year, and the unexpended balances which were covered into the Treasury of the United States.

I shall not make objection to this; but I do hope that the Committee on Appropriations will not tolerate this practice; and I wish the President of the United States would issue the necessary order, if it is proper for him to issue an order—and I think it is—at least instruct the executive agencies under him not to approve this practice and in the future to abandon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 6, after the word "list," to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no person shall be commissioned as an officer in the Marine Corps prior to June 1, 1933.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 4, after the figures "$7,497,537," to insert "together with $100,000 of the unexpended balance of 'Pay, Marine Corps, 1932,'" so as to read:

Pay of enlisted men, active list: For pay and allowances of noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as prescribed by law, and for the expenses of clerks of the United States Marine Corps traveling under orders, and including additional compensation for enlisted men of the Marine Corps qualified as expert riflemen, sharpshooters, marksmen, or regularly detailed as gun captains, gun pointers, cooks, messmen, including interest on deposits by enlisted men, post-exchange debts of deserters and of men discharged or sentenced to terms of imprisonment while in debt to the United States, under such rules as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and the authorized travel allowance of discharged enlisted men, and for prizes for excellence in gunnery exercises and target practice, and for pay of enlisted men designated as Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks both afloat and ashore, and for gratuities to enlisted men discharged not under honorable conditions—pay and allowances, $7,497,537, together with $100,000 of the unexpended balance of "Pay, Marine Corps, 1932"; allowance for lodging and subsistence, $670,542; in all, $8,168,079.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Maine how long it is contemplated that the marines shall be retained in Haiti, and what part of this appropriation for the marines will be required to meet the expenses of maintaining marine forces in a foreign land?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think under the treaty with Haiti we are obliged to keep the marines there until 1936. The expenditures this year for keeping the marines in Haiti, over and above what they would have been for keeping the marines at home, or on ordinary duty, amount to something like $160,000. They have gradually been reducing the annual expenditures.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I disagree with him in both statements which he has submitted. First, there is no treaty obligation resting upon the United States calling for the retention in Haiti of American marines. They could be withdrawn to-morrow without the violation of any treaty. As a matter of fact, many insist that the so-called treaty is not a valid one. But I shall not challenge the validity of the treaty. I do insist that we shall at a very early date withdraw our marines from Haiti. Their retention is provocative of unrest, and certainly results in criticism from the Haitians, as well as from a large number of people in Latin America. There is a general feeling upon the part of some of the Latin American countries that we were imperialistic, economically, if not politically, when we went into Haiti, carried on war against the Haitian people, and superimposed upon them a military control; which military control, in one form or another, though greatly modified, still persists. I wish the Senator could indicate when the marines are to be withdrawn.

May I reply to the second observation of the Senator? Certainly the retention in Haiti of several hundred marines—I do not recall the number who are there now, because some have been withdrawn, but I think it is five or six hundred—can not be met with an expenditure of $150,000. The Senator is certainly in error in assuming that we can send the marines to Haiti and keep them there for an indefinite period for $150,000. The cost of sending them there would exceed that. We have to have naval vessels—naval vessels require oil or coal—and the expenses incident to the transportation of the troops to Haiti call for a very large appropriation, and certainly the retention of several hundred of our marines in Haiti will involve a very large expenditure.

I remember two or three years ago inquiring into that matter, and my information led me to the conclusion that it cost us between a million and two million dollars for the retention of marines in Haiti for one year.

I was disposed to offer an amendment, one which I have offered upon several appropriation bills of this character, providing that no part of the appropriation for the Marine Corps should be used for the maintenance in Haiti of any military forces of the United States. I shall not press that motion, however, at this time, because I sincerely hope that within a few months our marines will be withdrawn. If not, then I give notice to my friend that when the next naval bill is before us he will find considerable opposition to it if there is not a provision for the withdrawal of the marines from Haiti.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 15, after the figures "$585,066," to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter no enlisted man of the Marine Corps shall be assigned to the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 783).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 19, before the word "mileage," to strike out "Not to exceed for" and insert "for," so as to read:

For mileage and actual and necessary expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law to officers traveling under orders without troops, $84,334.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 21, after the word "and," to strike out "including not to exceed $26,250 for," so as to read:

Not to exceed for transportation of troops and applicants for enlistment, including cash in lieu of ferriage and transfers en route; toilet kits for issue to recruits upon their first enlistment and other incidental expenses of the recruiting service; and transportation for dependents of officers and enlisted men, $381,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 15, after the figures "$90,000," to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of the sums herein specifically appropriated under "Pay, Marine Corps," and "General expenses" for the pay and maintenance of the Marine Corps Reserve during training shall be expended for any other purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Alterations to naval vessels," on page 50, line 25, after the figures "1931," to strike out "(to be completely accomplished within a total cost of $27,000,000)," so as to read:

Toward the alterations and repairs required for the purpose of modernizing the United States ships New Mexico, Mississippi, and Idaho, authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize alterations and repairs to certain naval vessels," approved February 28, 1931, $14,000,000, this sum, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $10,000,000 for the same purpose contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, to be apportioned and to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Increase of the Navy," on page 51, line 16, after the word "authorized," to strike out "$23,063,000" and insert "$15,063,000," so as to read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $15,063,000, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal year 1933 from the naval supply account fund to this appropriation of sums aggregating not to exceed $6,000,000, and the total sums hereby made available shall remain available until expended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maine what disposition was made of the $30,000,000 appropriated in an independent bill for the modernization of battleships?

Mr. HALE. They have gone ahead under the authorization. Ten million dollars was appropriated last year.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that there was an authorization of $30,000,000 for the modernization of battleships.

Mr. HALE. Yes; an authorization.

Mr. KING. How much was directly appropriated?

Mr. HALE. Ten million dollars was appropriated last year.

Mr. KING. Does the appropriation carried on page 51 relate to any part of that $30,000,000 authorization?

Mr. HALE. It does. We have already had the $10,000,000 appropriated last year, and we are appropriating $14,000,000 this year, and the balance will be appropriated to finish them up next year.

Mr. KING. Does that modernize all of our capital ships?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no. The last five have not been modernized. The last five are somewhat more modern than the ones before them, but there are still alterations which will have to be made to bring them up to date.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not contend that the post-Jutland ships should be modernized very much, does he?

Mr. HALE. They have to be modernized in certain respects.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 15, after the word "authorized," to strike out "$4,167,333" and insert "$3,000,000," so as to read:

Armor, armament, and ammunition: Toward the armor, armament, and ammunition for vessels heretofore authorized $3,000,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 23, after the word "total," to insert "appropriation," and on page 53, at the end of line 4, to strike out "$4,569,000" and insert "$4,844,000," so as to read:

The total appropriation cost of the following vessels shall not exceed the sum stated after each, namely: Fleet submarine No. 169, $4,955,000; fleet submarine No. 170, $3,996,000; fleet submarine No. 171, $4,196,000; destroyer No. 348, $4,934,000; destroyer No. 349, $4,694,000, and destroyers Nos. 350, 351, and 352, $4,844,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, after line 22, to insert the following additional section:

SEC. 4. When approved by the President, not to exceed 12 per cent of each of the amounts hereinbefore appropriated shall be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects named, but no one item shall be increased by more than 15 per cent: Provided, That any such transfers shall be reported to Congress in the annual Budget.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have a few committee amendments which I desire to offer from the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 10, after the word "control," the Senator from Maine proposes to insert the following:

And the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract for purchase of the patents covered by this license agreement, subject to appropriations therefor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like an explanation of the amendment. It seems to me this is giving carte blanche authority to enter into contracts whether they are advantageous or not.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to authorize the Government to purchase a patent, for the use of which they have been paying a certain rate per year. This is a radio-control patent taken out by young Mr. Hammond, son of John Hays Hammond. It has been used in connection with steering by radio of targets for gun practice. It also in all probability will be useful in connection with the control of airplanes.

Several years ago an arrangement was made with Mr. Hammond whereby, for $720,000, we could purchase the patent, and in the meanwhile we agreed to pay him $90,000 for each 18 months' use of the patent. That we have done for one period of 18 months, and this is to extend the same privilege for another period of 18 months, and then to provide that the next year we shall go ahead and purchase the patent from him, deducting therefrom the two payments of $90,000 each, or a total of $180,000. Unless we do this, the department is afraid we may lose the patent altogether. It is very valuable from a military standpoint.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator willing to give the Navy the unrestricted authority to enter into contract without any maximum amount to be paid?

Mr. HALE. Why, no. That is all arranged. The offer of $720,000 has been made. I have explained that.

Mr. KING. I did not hear the Senator's statement if he said so previously.

Mr. HALE. We have already paid $180,000 on that account. It is not satisfactory to the owner of the patent to continue that arrangement longer.

Mr. KING. As I understand, then, the Navy has made a contract to pay $720,000 for the patent?

Mr. HALE. No; but they want the right to make the contract for the future. They simply agreed to lease it for $90,000 for a period of 18 months. They have done that for one 18-month period and are doing it again; but in the future they want to buy it; otherwise they fear they will lose it altogether.

Mr. KING. This means the patent will cost the Government $1,000,000 or more?

Mr. HALE. No; $730,000. The $180,000 will be deducted from the total amount.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator made an investigation of the merits of the patent?

Mr. HALE. My opinion as an expert would not be of value. I have heard about the matter, and from what I can learn I believe it is a valuable patent for the Navy to own. The committee went into the matter very carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Page 30, in line 4, after the word "admission," insert the following:

Provided further, That all officers of the Staff Corps with the rank of lieutenant who were appointed in the Regular Navy under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920, who are 45 or more years of age, or who have completed 20 or more years of service, counting all service for which they would be entitled for credit for voluntary retirement, and who undergo the required examination for promotion to the rank of lieutenant commander and are found not professionally qualified, shall be transferred to the retired list of the Navy: Provided—

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator is quite right that it is subject to a point of order, but I had hoped the Senator would not make the point of order. This is exactly what we did last year for the line of the Navy but did not do for the staff. It is simply giving the staff the same chance that the line has. If we do not do it, men who take their examinations and are found not to have passed will be turned out with one year's pay instead of 2½ per cent for each year of service they have had.

Mr. KING. I may not understand the full implications of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The Senator did not hear the whole amendment read. The clerk had only begun to read when the Senator from Utah interrupted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the entire amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 30, in line 4, after the word "admission," insert the following:

: Provided further, That all officers of the Staff Corps with the rank of lieutenant who were appointed in the Regular Navy under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920, who are 45 or more years of age, or who have completed 20 or more years of service, counting all service for which they would be entitled for credit for voluntary retirement, and who undergo the required examination for promotion to the rank of lieutenant commander and are found not professionally qualified, shall be transferred to the retired list of the Navy: Provided further, That if such officers were permanently appointed with the rank of ensign or above in any of the permanent Staff Corps of the Navy while holding permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant rank in the Navy, they shall have the option of reverting to such permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant status in the lineal position to which their seniority would have entitled them had their service subsequent to such appointment been rendered in the status to which they revert: Provided further, That during the fiscal year 1933 no new appointment shall be made in any of the Staff Corps to fill a vacancy caused by the retirement or reversion provided for herein: And provided further, That officers retired in accordance with the provisions of this section shall receive pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of their active-duty pay multiplied by the number of years of service which they were entitled to credit in computation of their longevity pay on the active list, not to exceed a total of 75 per cent of said active pay.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this would seem to be a regular promotion measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I insist on my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah makes the point of order, and the point of order is sustained. Are there any further committee amendments?

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, line 21, insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That without deposit to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States and withdrawal on money requisitions, receipts of public money from sales or other sources by officers of the Navy and Marine Corps on disbursing duty and charged in their official accounts may be used by them as required for current expenditures, all necessary bookkeeping adjustments of appropriations, funds, and accounts to be made in the settlement of their disbursing accounts.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to remedy a situation which has arisen because of a decision of the comptroller's office. On ships abroad, where the canteen secures the funds as a result of the sale of cigarettes and other articles to the men, under the law as it has been heretofore construed the funds have been used to replenish the stock of the canteen and ship stores. But by decision of the comptroller it was determined that the funds could not be used to purchase an additional supply of cigarettes, and so forth, at the next port, but that they must be deposited in a bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States and then a check presented to that bank to secure the money with which to buy the articles necessary to replenish the stock.

The result is a great inconvenience as well as some expense. If a ship is at Guam, they can not use the funds received to replenish the stock, but must deposit them in a bank at San Francisco and then present a check to that bank. The custom which has heretofore prevailed has existed in the Navy for more than half a century, and only within the last 60 days has the ruling been made to the contrary. The amendment seeks only to correct that situation and to allow them to proceed as they have proceeded heretofore in the Navy.

Mr. DILL. This would seem to be legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNES. It is. The committee directed the Senator in charge of the bill to present the amendment, and in the committee I stated I would call it to the attention of the Senate, because I am satisfied that when it is understood there can be no objection to it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the matter, because I have a small amendment of my own that I want to offer; but the Senator in charge of the bill suggested to me that it would be out of order, although my amendment will not add anything to the appropriation but will simply provide for the use of some money that will furnish labor for workingmen in the town where one of the navy yards is located on the Pacific coast. If my amendment is to be ruled out on a point of order, I do not feel that I should sit here silently and let other amendments go in when they are likewise subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNES. I submit to the Senator that I do not think he would take that position if he considered that it was in the interest of the service and of the men.

Mr. DILL. I agree with the purpose of the amendment. I think there ought to be a certain amount of liberality in these matters. I am not disposed to raise the point of order against the amendments that do not increase the appropriation but simply provide for the disposal of them.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator entertains that view, will he not take that course as to some other amendment and not as to this particular one?

Mr. DILL. The principle is a principle that ought to be observed.

Mr. BYRNES. But the Senator is not in favor of the principle of objecting to such amendments?

Mr. DILL. No, I am not; but when the principle of objecting is to be used against my own amendment, I feel that it is a principle that ought to work both ways.

Mr. BYRNES. I certainly am not using it against the Senator's amendment, and I am interested in this particular amendment only because it appealed to me as being really in the interest of the service.

Mr. DILL. I am not going to object to the amendment, but I want to call attention to the fact that amendments are being placed on the bill which are not really warranted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, after line 2, insert the following:

The availability of the $200,000 authorized by the act approved February 12, 1931, Public No. 620, of the Seventy-first Congress, to be expended from the naval hospital fund for the acquisition of land for a site for the hospital buildings at Philadelphia, Pa., authorized by said act, is hereby extended to include investigations by contract or otherwise, of subsurface conditions at said site.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does that involve any additional appropriation?

Mr. HALE. It is simply a provision authorizing the $200,000 appropriated last year, for the purpose of acquiring title to the land for the hospital at Philadelphia, to be used for making an investigation of the subsurface conditions, which under the terms of the appropriation could not otherwise be done. It does not increase any appropriation whatever.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator he is not asking for an additional appropriation for this item, but is asking that a part of an appropriation made may be used for the purpose of determining the subsurface character of the ground?

Mr. HALE. That is right. I understand that a certain Senator proposes to offer an amendment asking for an appropriation for the hospital, but that will come in later on.

Mr. KING. And that will be subject to a point of order, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have been authorized by the committee to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 63, after line 4, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. All unobligated balances of appropriations heretofore made and not expressly made available until expended, either herein or otherwise, shall be covered into the Treasury on July 1, 1932, and be credited to miscellaneous receipts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have one further amendment to offer. On page 46, line 23, after the figures "$15,151,089," I move to insert the following:

together with $85,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation "Pay, Marine Corps, 1932."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the secretary state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 23, after the figures "$15,151,089" it is proposed to insert the following:

together with $85,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation "Pay, Marine Corps, 1932."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amendment which we just adopted requiring all unexpended balances to be covered into the Treasury would be in conflict with the amendment which the Senator has just offered, would it not?

Mr. HALE. I think the last amendment adopted would cover those which are not in this bill specifically appropriated.

Mr. KING. I think when the Marine Corps has an appropriation in this bill for the purpose indicated of $15,151,089, there is no necessity for an additional appropriation which this amendment really provides; that is, it is equivalent to an additional appropriation. If I can raise a point of order against it, I will do so.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will explain to the Senator the purpose of this amendment and of another one which I will also offer, providing for $40,000 to come out of the unexpended balance of the Marine Corps appropriation in the same way.

The purpose of this amendment and the other amendment which I am about to offer is to provide for sending between 400 and 500 marines to Nicaragua to conduct the elections which are to be held there this autumn.

In 1927, when the Nicaraguan revolution was at its height, President Coolidge sent Colonel Stimson to Nicaragua to investigate in an endeavor to compose the difficulties. Colonel Stimson succeeded in persuading the revolutionary leaders to lay down their arms on the express understanding that the United States would supervise the next elections, to take place in November, 1928.

The leaders of the Liberal Party, who were also the leaders of the revolutionary movement, charged that the Conservative Party, then in office, had been able to remain in charge of the administration for 12 years because it controlled the electoral machinery and the Liberals had no chance at the polls. They felt the only way that they could get into office was through a revolution, and they would only desist from the revolution if the United States would agree to supervise the elections so that they would be free and fair.

The elections were held in November, 1928, under the supervision of Maj. Gen. Frank R. McCoy, United States Army, and both parties were thoroughly satisfied with their conduct and felt that they had been scrupulously fair. In October, just before the elections, the Liberal candidate, General Moncada, proposed to the Conservative candidate, Señor Benard, that they agree that whichever one of them should be elected he would immediately ask for the supervision by the United States of the elections in 1932, so that Nicaragua might have four years of peace and tranquility in order that it might recover in some measure from the effects of the revolutionary disturbances and carry the program of 1928 to its logical conclusion.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. NYE. How many years of peace and tranquillity were to be assured by the presence of American marines in Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. I am not assuring anybody about peace and tranquillity there, but I can assure the Senator that, so far as marines being in Haiti is concerned, and so far as their being in Nicaragua is concerned, the Navy has no interest in it. The marines simply go where they are sent, and they are there because the State Department asked to have them go.

Mr. Benard agreed. General Moncada was elected President and took office on January 1, 1929. Immediately thereafter he verbally requested, through the American minister, that the United States should supervise the next election, and in February, 1929, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Nicaragua in a formal note made this same request on behalf of President Moncada. The United States agreed to do so. In order that the supervision of the 1932 presidential elections should be effective it was necessary to supervise the congressional elections in 1930. Captain Johnson, of the United States Navy, was appointed for this purpose and those elections were also carried out in a manner completely satisfactory to the two Nicaraguan parties. Admiral Woodward, United States Navy, has been appointed to supervise the elections in November of this year.

The Navy Department plans to send to Nicaragua between 400 and 500 marines to supervise these elections. The men whom they are sending there are men who have had experience in the other elections which have been held in Nicaragua and are thoroughly familiar with such work.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How many United States marines are now in Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. There are 127 officers and 861 men, and that number includes about 200 men who are with the Guardia Nacional. At one time, in 1926, I may say to the Senator, we had nearly 5,000 men there, but the number has been gradually reduced.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that, of course. The number now is how many officers and men?

Mr. HALE. The present number is 861 men and 127 officers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Something less than a thousand men?

Mr. HALE. Just under a thousand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How long is it proposed to keep American marines in Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, the department expects after these elections are held to get all our forces out of Nicaragua.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What would it cost the Government to send 300 or 400 marines, who appear to be professional or trained election supervisors in foreign countries, to Nicaragua to carry out that very strange policy?

Mr. HALE. The two items for which I have asked appropriations to come out of unexpended balances will amount to about $125,000. That represents the additional cost, and it is the belief of the department that after the election is held the marines can move bag and baggage out of Nicaragua.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it proposed, in addition to approximately a thousand officers and men now in Nicaragua, to send down 300 more? Why not let those who are now there perform such functions as may be found indispensable in operating a foreign government?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I asked the department the same question, and they informed me that it needs men of considerable experience to conduct an election, and these are men who have had such experience.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think it would be fair to take the time of the Senator from Maine to express my views on this proposal, and if he would prefer that I refrain for the present from doing so, I shall avail myself of the opportunity to take the floor in my own right after a few minutes.

Mr. HALE. I am through with the floor, Mr. President, and will be glad to hear from the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is to me an amazing proposition.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine, having charge of the bill, will recall that in the committee there was very much doubt about the provision which he has offered as an amendment; so much so that it did not go into the bill. I want to appeal to the chairman to withdraw the amendment, for, as disclosed in the committee, if he insists upon it here it will lead to prolonged discussion and delay the passage of the bill. If the sentiment expressed in the committee fairly reflects the attitude of the Senate, the amendment probably will not be adopted, and why should we take so much time in a useless debate over this matter?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no personal interest whatever in the matter, but as our Government has agreed to go ahead and supervise this election, and on the strength of our agreement certain things have been done in Nicaragua, it seemed to me that there is no possible way of getting action unless the matter is brought to the attention of the Senate. Unless action is taken here, I do not see where it can be taken, and we shall have to violate our good faith.

Mr. BRATTON. I shall not trespass further upon the courtesy of the Senator from Arkansas except to say that I think the Senator from Maine is inviting long delay in the passage of the bill if he insists upon his amendment.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I think this is an all-important matter that we are about to consider, and, if the Senator from Arkansas will yield for that purpose, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Schall
Bankhead	Dale	Keyes	Sheppard
Black	Davis	King	Shipstead
Blaine	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Borah	Fletcher	Logan	Steiwer
Bratton	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Glass	Moses	Townsend
Byrnes	Glenn	Neely	Trammell
Capper	Goldsborough	Norris	Tydings
Caraway	Hale	Nye	Vandenberg
Cohen	Harrison	Oddie	Wagner
Connally	Hawes	Patterson	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Copeland	Johnson	Reed	White
Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ark.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In just a moment.

From time to time there are presented to the Senate unusual, surprising proposals for legislation. This is entitled to stand in a class by itself.

I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that it is important to get the appropriation bills out of the way as quickly as possible, and it is evident that there will be a very considerable opposition to this amendment——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That certainly is evident.

Mr. HALE. I will very reluctantly withdraw it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. Since the Senator withdraws the amendment there is no occasion for making the remarks which I contemplated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further committee amendments?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have one further amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be sent to the desk and read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 23, after the figures "$15,151,089," it is proposed to insert the following:

Together with $229,101 of the unexpended balance of pay, Marine Corps, 1932.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, those are the two unexpended balances that came up in connection with the question of pay of the Marine Corps that I discussed with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the total does not carry them with it. I am simply adding these words for that reason.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the withdrawal of the amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from Maine, it is my understanding that there is no fund in this bill out of which professional election supervisors, being members of the United States Marine Corps, may be sent to Nicaragua for the purpose of supervising the elections in that country in 1932.

Mr. HALE. There are simply the general funds for the travel and subsistence of the Marine Corps.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, certainly, Mr. President; but I am asking the Senator the question now whether there is any fund in this bill out of which 400 American marines, who have had experience in supervising elections in Nicaragua and other Latin American countries, may be sent down to Nicaragua for that express purpose. What I am trying to ascertain is whether the withdrawal of the amendment which the Senator proposed to carry out that most remarkable and amazing proposition will prevent the sending of additional marines to Nicaragua for election purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there is no special provision made for any such purpose in the bill. Whether the department could send marines under the general appropriations in the bill I can not say. Possibly they could.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will point out to me a fund in the bill that may be used in that way, I should like to attach to it such language that it can not be done, and I shall feel constrained to make the remarks that I refrained from making a few minutes ago. I do not make that expression as a threat but as a mere statement of fact. Unless it can be made to appear that this Government, while maintaining a thousand American marines in a remote Latin American country like Nicaragua, is not going to carry out the policy of sending down additional marines to perform services in connection with local elections in that country, refraining from using the marines already there, on the theory that it requires experts trained in the art and practices of controlling or influencing or supervising elections in foreign countries—unless I can receive some assurance of that nature I should like to offer an amendment dealing with the subject.

Mr. HALE. I can give the Senator no assurance whatever of that.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether it is not possible to write into this bill a proviso against any of these funds being used for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; a limitation. I propose an amendment, to be attached at the proper place in the bill, providing that no sum appropriated in this bill shall be used in transporting United States marines to Nicaragua for service in connection with the supervision of elections there.

Mr. NYE. I am glad the Senator is doing that.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in view of the circumstances, if we are going into this matter, and we are going to have the delay in any event——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not asking any delay now. The Senator can not put that responsibility on me.

Mr. HALE (continuing). I might as well go back to my original amendment that was offered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. Let the Senator propose his amendment, and let the Senate take a vote on the amendment; but I shall insist on my amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised by the clerk that there is still a committee amendment pending. The Chair was of the impression that it had been withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was withdrawn, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine offered another amendment which is pending. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be considered pending. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 23, after the figures "$15,151,089," it is proposed to insert the following:

together with $229,101 of the unexpended balance of Pay, Marine Corps, 1932.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maine:

At the end of his amendment, add the following proviso:

Provided, That no money appropriated in this act shall be used to defray the expense of sending additional marines to Nicaragua to supervise an election there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether his amendment is an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator's amendment goes through, there is no particular point in my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas offers his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to realize what we are doing.

This Government has entered into an agreement to take charge of the elections which are to be held this fall in Nicaragua. We made that agreement in 1928; and we are called upon, if we are to act squarely, to live up to the agreement that we have made. It is expected of us by the Nicaraguans. If this matter simply goes by default, and the marines do not supervise the elections, it will leave this country in a very poor position as far as the rest of the world is concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate has just listened to a most remarkable attempt to vindicate a policy which has been impeached by experience, and which has never been strongly entrenched in the judgment of students of our foreign problems.

The Senator from Maine has declared that in order to carry out a contract made by the present Secretary of State, then serving as an ambassador extraordinary—a contract by which the United States undertook to supervise elections in Nicaragua in the interest of the preservation of peace—it is necessary to make use of a large group of United States marines, approximately 400 in number, who served as election supervisors in years gone by, and whose experience in that service makes it necessary to withdraw them from their present duties, transport them to a great distance at large expense to the United States, notwithstanding all the while there are in Nicaragua approximately 1,000 marines—officers and men.

Mr. President, have we come to the point where we are maintaining a trained military corps to control or supervise elections held under other flags than our own? We do not employ the military force of the United States to supervise elections in this country. It is repugnant to our people.

The policy is obnoxious to the citizenship of our own country. Now, it seems we have been committed to controlling or supervising elections in foreign lands and to maintaining a military force especially trained in such service.

Mr. President, anyone familiar with our political system and its institutions must regard that practice as subversive of liberty, and as destructive of amity and good will between our Government and foreign governments. How often during recent years have we heard it said that the United States will not attend to her own affairs, that she insists upon maintaining an attitude of domination toward weaker governments on the Western Hemisphere? It is not an answer to declare that groups within these countries subject to revolution are often anxious that we exercise the power of our Government in controlling their processes.

A complete answer to the Senator from Maine is found in the fact that there are already more marines in Nicaragua than are needed for any legitimate purpose, and there is no excuse for taxing the American people, particularly in times like these, to send additional military forces to a foreign land to control elections.

The quicker we get out of Nicaragua the better it will be for the glory of our flag and for the safety of the men who maintain it there.

Why spend $120,000 sending down specially trained marines, experienced in holding and supervising elections in foreign countries? We ought to get out of that kind of business, and do it quickly.

If we have made a contract that is binding to supply a military force in the election of 1932, let us use the troops which are there and keep other marines at home.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I will never again vote to appropriate a dollar of public money for the purpose contemplated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine. His amendment ought to be voted down, and the amendment limiting the use of funds carried in this bill agreed to, so that the marines may not be sent to Nicaragua for the purpose of supervising an election there, while a large number of marines already are there. This should be done by a decisive vote.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, no more important question has been presented to this body during recent times. Perhaps even during the economic crisis which encompasses us, we could afford to spend $120,000 if it were for some other purpose, such as relief. But I rise to join with the Senator from Arkansas in expressing, as emphatically as I am able to, my disapproval of the policy of this Republic in lending her armed forces toward the administration of the domestic affairs of another people. We have had too much of that in the past. It is a sordid chapter in our history that we ever lent ourselves to a program of that kind.

Mr. President, the sooner the United States discontinues the policy, and stamps her disapproval upon its revival, the sooner we can forget the course upon which we embarked a few years ago.

It is said by the Senator from Maine, having the bill in charge, that we made a solemn contract, obligating us to supervise the forthcoming election in Nicaragua. The only way through which this Republic can bind herself concerning another nation is by a treaty, which this body must approve. I challenge the legal soundness of the assertion that a Cabinet officer, or any other representative in the executive branch of the Government, without the concurrence of this body, can bind us morally, legally, or otherwise, to such an extent that we must carry the agreement into execution, and appropriate $120,000 to send armed forces to another country to oversee, to supervise, to regulate their domestic affairs.

It is not to the credit of the United States that we ever undertook such a thing in the past, and it will be less to our credit if we repeat it here to-day. Let other nations attend to their own internal affairs. We would repudiate the suggestion if it were offered by another nation concerning us, and we should deal with them accordingly.

Mr. President, is it possible that, amidst all of the talk we have heard during recent times of our Budget being unbalanced, of jobless men walking hither and yon throughout this country vainly in search of employment; aye, with thousands of them here in the capital, we propose to take from the Treasury $120,000 money of the overburdened taxpayers, to defray the expenses of sending additional marines, over and above almost a thousand who are already in Nicaragua, to supervise an election down there?

The Senator from Maine says, with the approval of the department, that we must send experts down there, men who understand enough about the internal affairs of Nicaragua, men trained in the technique of their election machinery, who can supervise, in an expert fashion, the holding of an election by the free people in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I greatly regret that the Senator from Maine did not withdraw the amendment, but since the issue is here, let us make disposition of it, and let us stamp our disapproval upon the making of agreements by individuals to supervise elections in another commonwealth. It is none of our business. It is to the discredit of the United States that we ever did it in the past, and I hope we shall not repeat the discredit.

We are proud of our history. We look over its pages with pride, but one dark chapter throughout our history of more than a century and a half is that in the past we have appropriated money for the purpose and have taken charge of the election machinery of another people, and now it is proposed that we shall repeat the act.

Mr. President, it is closely akin to compounding a violation of law. I hope very much that this body will face the issue to-day and, by a decisive vote, will put this Republic on record as assuming a friendly attitude toward other nations and as affirmatively stamping our disavowal upon any proposal now or hereafter to expend money of the taxpayers of this country to ship hundreds of armed men to another nation, while there are hunger and want and need and distress and misery throughout this country.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I hesitate to interrupt the very eloquent presentation which the Senator from New Mexico is making on this subject, but I should like to ask him whether he feels that our activities in Nicaragua have been altogether unselfish, that we have had merely the interests of Nicaragua and her future at heart; or does he, instead, agree with some of the rest of us who believe that, generally speaking, our work in Nicaragua has been in defense of American dollars which have been taken there and planted there, invested by men who seemingly are not able to find adequate ground at home in which to plant their money for investing purposes?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I think that has been an important factor in our action concerning elections in Nicaragua. Selfishness has entered into it. A desire to follow dollars invested down there has had much to do with sending marines there. The sooner Americans quit investing their dollars in other countries, and then calling upon the Government to send armed forces to those countries to protect such investments under foreign flags, the sooner we confine ourselves to our own domestic affairs, the higher our Republic will stand in the forum of public opinion throughout the world.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senators who have just spoken have not learned that our Secretary of State is a law unto himself. It will be recalled that a few years ago the Senate, without a dissenting voice, passed a resolution expressing the conviction that the Secretary of State should discontinue his utterly lawless exercise of a function not appertaining in any sense or degree to that department, the matter of approving or disapproving foreign loans. He snapped his fingers in the face of the Senate, and the very next day promulgated additional so-called rules and regulations under which the State Department would continue exercising that lawless function, with the result that, with the approval of the State Department, the portfolios of banks from one end of this country to the other were filled with worthless foreign securities, which to-day are a tremendous contribution to the existing depression and the curtailment of credit under which we are suffering.

I venture to predict right now that we may adopt by a unanimous vote of the Senate the proposal presented by the Senator from Arkansas, and somewhere in some appropriation act the Secretary of State will find a sum that will be available to him to use the marines already in Nicaragua for the purpose of controlling the election there. The Senate need not be surprised if that should occur.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I want to raise my voice in commendation of what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

A few years ago in this body, on January 26, 1927, I made a somewhat extended speech with reference to the situation as it then existed in Nicaragua. I pointed out in that speech at that time not only how we had marines in Nicaragua for the purpose of supervising the election but how in actual practice we picked out the candidates for the Presidency of that and some of the other countries of Latin America. I quoted then from a paper published in Nicaragua which was controlled by Adolfo Diaz, as follows:

> As you see, these declarations of the American minister confirm the information that we gave to the public last Thursday, that Mr. Diaz would have the full moral and economic support of the United States Government. We said then that without the deposit of the Presidency in Adolfo Diaz "the United States Government would not favor the Conservative Party," a statement which has been fully confirmed by the declarations of Mr. Dennis, United States chargé d'affaires at Managua.

In that speech I denounced Diaz for what had been going on and for the part he had played in the revolution and for assuming control of the Nicaraguan Government.

A short time after I made that speech upon the floor of the Senate I visited the little country of Nicaragua, flying up from Panama to Managua. While I was there, I came in contact with Adolfo Diaz. He spoke to me with reference to the speech which I had made upon the floor of the Senate, and said to me, in substance, "Senator, I am not responsible for the situation which has taken place here. I did not want to be President of Nicaragua again; but," he said, "your State Department is responsible for the position in which I found myself. They came to me and urged me to become a candidate for the Presidency, telling me that if I would run for the Presidency, they would support my candidacy and would have the marines here to back me up in my administration."

Mr. President, it is a startling thing, it seems to me, for the Government of the United States—or, I should say, the State Department as distinguished from the Government of the United States—to go into any of the Latin American countries, not only sending the marines in there to supervise elections but actually picking out the candidate and saying to this candidate or that candidate or to this man or that man, "If you will run for the Presidency of your country, we will bring the marines down here and supervise the election; and if you are elected, we will have the marines here for the purpose of backing up your administration while you are in office, regardless of whether a majority of the people want you or not."

Not only have we been doing this in Nicaragua, but let me tell what is happening now. I listened last night to the reading of the platform of the Republican Party adopted in Chicago, and to my amazement they boasted, if you please, of the great work they have been doing in Haiti, how they have been taking the marines out of Haiti, and yet now, the very next day after they have boasted of that great work, we find the leaders upon the floor of the Senate asking for appropriations to send more marines down to Nicaragua for the purpose of supervising the election, and in all probability for the purpose of doing exactly what they did with Adolfo Diaz—picking out the candidate they want to see elected to the Presidency of that country.

Mr. President, without taking more of the time of the Senate to discuss the matter, I certainly hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be adopted. What we are going to be faced with undoubtedly is this situation: If I recall correctly the testimony, here we find some of our bankers or investment companies in New York going to some of these South American countries and actually paying money to bribe some of the members of some of the families of the heads of these governments to borrow money from the United States so that they can bring the bonds of those countries back and unload them upon the banks of the United States, and through them upon the general public; and then if something happens, if a revolution starts in that country or something else happens, these same bankers, who have been down there and bribed the officials of that government, will be coming to the Congress of the United States and asking the Congress to appropriate money—what for? To send the marines down there to be shot down in order that they might protect the money which these bankers have invested in those worthless bonds, many of which they have unloaded upon the people of the United States. That is where this policy is leading.

I agree heartily with the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas, and I hope not only will his amendment be agreed to but that we will take the marines out of Nicaragua entirely because, as I have said before, after visiting that country and after seeing those people, I would not give the life of one American marine for the whole damned country down there.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, any observation I might address to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] could be greatly fortified by the address I made in the Senate possibly two weeks since, when some of our men were killed in Nicaragua and I joined in the thought expressed by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] for the necessity of withdrawing our associations such as have been previously and really for a long time conducted there. For this moment I desire to address the Senate in vindication of the position that I took before this body on Saturday.

Mr. President, there is a tendency to assume that if a Senator rises in his place and addresses himself to some of the conditions of the country at large, he does so either for display or he does so for some prejudice and in order to express some attitude of antagonism. At any rate, it is charged that it is a familiar practice for the public servant to make an assertion that may calculate in itself to attract attention, but which is not founded upon any established facts. All the more is that accusation indulged in when it touches the international relations of our country. These are assumed to be misrepresented for political effect or partisan purposes and international prejudices.

On Saturday last I addressed the Senate, saying that I desired to pay my tribute of adulation, certainly of approval, to the President of the United States and his eminent Secretary of State for declining to be drawn into what I saw was a network of entanglements in the affairs of the foreign world under the guise of an economic conference called at Lausanne. I boldly preclaimed to this honorable body that the scheme afoot was one to initiate the cancellation of debts. The Senate was very patient with me late Saturday afternoon in allowing me to set forth my views. I warned the Senate that the object of the proposed gathering at Lausanne was such, and that we were being deluded into the theory that it was economic. I alleged that the purpose was to induce America under some guise of economic welfare to agree to a policy of cancellation of debt in consideration of some trade to be advanced to the United States by the debtors which it was urged would lift up and maintain a level of prices for America above those of our competitors of the European world. I said that the proposition was being extended as the consideration for the inducements for America to enter anew upon the canceling of the war debts or for a present lifetime moratorium.

There were those around us who could not conceive that circumstances such as these could be so quickly assembled before the country after the Senate of the United States had given its exequatur and injunction against such procedure on two different occasions lately in this body. I now beg to tender to the Senate—this morning the Associated Press, a reliable agency of information upon which we have been acting for too long a time to assume that either through prejudice or ignorance it would mislead a body such as ours, and a nation such as our people. I read from the Herald Tribune of New York City, of this morning, a paper recognized as the principal voice of the administration in power—certainly of the East—I read a part of the dispatch to which I particularly advise the attention of the Senate, as follows:

Lausanne, June 15.

The meeting is held this morning, to which I alluded in my address Saturday, as one on the eve of action. It was here, I said, that the real purpose of the meeting was to cancel the debts and initiate a policy leading to the adoption of cancellation of both war and commercial debts. Or, Mr. President, if we declined to yield to this design, we would be asked to adopt a moratorium that cut off the debts which were due us during the lifetime of the present generation. I charge that the inducement to us to adopt one or the other would be the promise, seductive in its form, alluring in its proposition, of extending trade to us that would compensate this particular time for the hard times we are enduring, and with which we were suffering with our common fellow countrymen.

I read from the cablegram:

LAUSANNE, SWITZERLAND, June 15.—A request that the United States cancel all war debts was being discussed to-night as the 600 members of delegations from 13 nations assembled here for to-morrow's opening session of the conference on debts and reparations at which a way to world economic recovery will be sought.

The request to the United States—in the event that it is decided on—will be presented to the conference in the form of a resolution. Whether such drastic action would be advisable was the topic of debate to-night at numerous private gatherings of the delegates.

M'DONALD PREPARES KEYNOTE

Meanwhile, J. Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain, who is slated to serve as president of the conference, prepared the keynote speech.

I am delighted to see my beloved friend of years, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], enter the Chamber, because in his reply, both historical and oratorical, to my address on Saturday, he assumed that my fears were without foundation and my intimation that this economic conference was for the purpose of canceling the debt could not be possible. Among other tributes he paid was one to Ramsay MacDonald as one who he felt was not the manner of man to make such a proposition under the conditions as indicated by me at the time, as I feared and anticipated. I therefore delight to have my able friend hear this cablegram sent from Lausanne at the meeting this morning.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I think that either the Senator is confused or I am confused with reference to the conferences that are to be called or will be called. I understood that the conference to which he referred was the economic conference as to which I have had a consultation with the President and with the State Department; it was not the Lausanne conference, but a conference that was to be called in future to deal with world-wide economic problems, and not with the question of reparations or the cancellation of debts. Obviously, I misunderstood the Senator, because I assumed that he was referring to the economic conference that was to be called, and not to the Lausanne conference that already had been called and to which delegates had already been assigned.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be, Mr. President, that the able presentation of my learned friend the eminent Senator from Utah of the silver question and his statement that he had solicited the President to cooperate with him and with others in bringing about a conference looking to the adjustment of the metallic question might have caused me to feel that the conference described by me was that in which he had participated with his excellent advice. I deplore if events so develop that the President shall not follow the counsel of my eminent friend from Utah, for I can imagine nothing that could guide the President so correctly as the opinion moving from such consultation and as the advice and conclusions of my eminent young friend, Senator KING—and I use the word "young" jealously.

I conclude by reading further from the article:

Meanwhile J. Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain, who is slated to serve as president of the conference, prepared the keynote speech with which he will open the proceedings.

Proceedings looking to cancellation and looking to some method that may accomplish that purpose before adjournment. Then the article proceeds:

The United States is not represented, but the Washington Government's offstage part is of extreme importance, for the deliberations will be carried on in an atmosphere made uncertain by the possible attitude of the United States toward proposals affecting war debts.

Mr. President, I merely present this so that it may be seen that the views I expressed to the Senate when they tolerated me in their patience at rather a late hour were justified from the apprehension I disclosed. I again assert that I send forthwith my congratulations that the heads of our administration were not deluded into accepting a part in that which would have been so destructive to the value of our country, to justice to our Nation, and to the rights of our people. I trust nothing will transpire that shall lead us into this trap, which, as I again assert, has been adroitly laid. We prefer to adopt the text to-day that we find in Julius Cæsar where Cassius says to Brutus—

> But since the affairs of men rest still uncertain,
> Let's reason with the worst that may befall.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I hope the substitute of the Senator from Arkansas will prevail. Our excursions into Nicaragua have been very expensive, and it is almost tragic that we have not had a sufficient sense of humor to get a good laugh out of our policy there. If we could have appreciated the "comedy of errors," we could possibly afford to pay for "love's labors" that have been "lost."

We went down there, I think, in 1926. Mr. Diaz had accomplished a coup d'état; he had driven the President of Nicaragua out of the country into Mexico, and had occupied the President's office. Moncado, the present President, was Sacassa's general in the field in charge of the forces that had been driven out of the government and were trying to regain control of the government for the lawfully elected President.

There was a great stir within our Government. We were informed by a statement from the State Department that, in fact, the army under Moncado was a communist army under the direction of the Mexican Government and that Moncado and Sacassa were agents of the Soviet Government of Russia and were controlled by the Soviet Government of Russia through the Government of Mexico. That was the reason that was given for sending the marines to Nicaragua in 1926. Sacassa and Moncado were stated to be dangerous agents engaged in leading a conspiracy against the Government of the United States.

I protested sending marines at that time. I did not believe the stories that were told about any conspiracy of the kind that was described by the State Department when the marines went there.

We then changed the policy and decided we were not there to drive out communists and to stop this conspiracy, but we decided we were there to control an election. As a result of our control, General Moncado, who was supposed to be the chief general of the communist forces engaged in a conspiracy against the Government of the United States, was elected President of Nicaragua, and the man who had been President and who had had to flee from Nicaragua and go to Mexico and whom our State Department accused of being the agent of the Government of Mexico and of the Soviet Government of Russia, was appointed by Moncado to become Nicaraguan minister at Washington. The tragic part of it is that, out of 120,000,000 people, there was not one who to my knowledge had a sufficient sense of humor to cause him to laugh.

Now Moncado is a candidate for President, and Sacassa is also a candidate for President. Here we have, on the one hand, Sacassa's general and here we have, on the other, Sacassa himself, both candidates for the office of President of Nicaragua, and we are going to send marines down as arbiters, as umpires, to see that one or the other is elected President.

I do not care who shall be elected President; but I wish that the great Government of the United States could conduct its affairs in a more dignified manner and with less humorous and at the same time less tragic results.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it seems as if the only person who saw the humor of the situation was the "Melancholy Dane." [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. NYE asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will send the amendment to the desk in order that it may be pending, and I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Davis	King	Schall
Austin	Dill	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Fletcher	Lewis	Shipstead
Barbour	Frazier	Logan	Shortridge
Barkley	Glass	McGill	Smoot
Black	Glenn	McNary	Steiwer
Blaine	Gore	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Hale	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Harrison	Neely	Townsend
Byrnes	Hawes	Norbeck	Trammell
Capper	Hayden	Nye	Tydings
Caraway	Hebert	Oddie	Vandenberg
Cohen	Johnson	Patterson	Wagner
Connally	Jones	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Copeland	Kean	Reed	Watson
Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Couzens	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.	White

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida offers the following amendment:

On page 41, line 23, strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$5,715,000."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I very much hope that this amendment will be agreed to, so that it may be considered by the conferees. It is an item that was estimated for and recommended by the department; and if we can have it adopted by the Senate, it can be considered by the conferees.

I hope the amendment can be adopted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the committee considered this matter. The Budget provided for $715,000 more than was put into the bill. The House, wishing to economize, cut out this amount. The Senate committee did not put it back.

Out of this $715,000 the department will be able to get about 22 planes, and that number would be necessary to carry out the provisions of the 5-year aircraft-building program. They will be somewhat under the numbers required in the program if it is not done. In the interest of economy we did not put in the amount. I see no objection, however, to putting it in, so that the contracts for next year can be made, as the Senator suggests; and if the Senator wishes to have that done, I shall not object.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like very much to have the amendment inserted in the bill. It will have a detrimental rather than an economical effect if this amount is not placed in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Under the head of Bureau of Aeronautics we have very large appropriations—first, $13,000,000 plus; then $2,200,000; then $7,200,000; then $1,450,000—an aggregate of $25,211,105, out of which $5,000,000 are to be devoted to various purposes.

In view of the very large appropriations carried by this bill, considerably more than $300,000,000—and I think the bill ought to be reduced to $275,000,000—it seems to me that to add to this total $5,000,000 could scarcely be justified.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this is an authorization, it is true; but I can not believe that the House realized that to leave out this authorization would so upset and interfere with the plans of the department that some of the air activities would be so curtailed as to throw probably 600 or 1,000 people out of employment. I should like very much to get the amendment into the bill, have it considered by the conferees, and have the House and Senate present their respective attitudes. The amount was recommended by the department, and I think the department still feels that it would be a very advantageous item in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the total appropriations for the air this year were reduced about $6,000,000 over last year. This provision, if it goes in as the Senator has offered it, would not add any planes at the present time. It would simply authorize the department to contract for them for another year. I see no objection to the amendment, and I shall be glad to accept it and take it to conference.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is a very large reduction already in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not make any objection to this amendment. Unless it is made, it will mean shutting down air stations to a very large extent. It will diminish the training of flyers after the Government has invested millions of dollars in air stations. They will have to stop training because they will not have the necessary planes. This will enable them to do it to some extent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course any objection would not be availing unless a vote were taken. I shall not ask for that. I shall vote against the amendment, however; and, indeed, I felt disposed to offer an amendment reducing the appropriation for the Bureau of Aeronautics from $25,000,000 to $20,000,000.

In examining the various appropriations made in past years, and comparing our naval and military expenses with those of other nations, I can not reach any conclusion other than that we are extravagant and militaristic, if we are to give to the word "militaristic" the interpretation ordinarily applied.

In 1914 our Navy Department had an appropriation of $144,000,000.

In 1915 the appropriation was $150,000,000.

In 1923, coming down to the postwar period, the appropriation was $300,000,000. We were then completing a considerable number of naval vessels.

In 1924 it was $325,000,000.

In 1925 it was $278,000,000. I am omitting the smaller figures.

In 1926 the naval appropriation was $324,000,000.

In 1927 it was $325,000,000.

In 1928 it was $320,00,000.

In 1929, instead of making a reduction as we should have done, we increased the appropriation to $394,000,000.

Mr. President, we are spending entirely too much for military purposes. Our appropriations exceed those of any other nation on earth. We charge the Bolshevik Government of Russia with militaristic aspirations, with the maintenance of a large army, and a purpose to construct a large navy upon the Baltic and the Black Seas; yet the appropriations of the Bolshevik Government are several hundred million dollars less than the appropriations of the United States.

The appropriations of France, the appropriations of Great Britain for the army and for the navy, for all military purposes are less in the case of each of those nations by between one hundred and fifty and two hundred million dollars than the appropriations made by the United States. Yet in a year of peace, when we profess to be the great moral leaders of the world, when we are clamoring for peace, and when we have our representatives attending a disarmament conference, we are called upon to appropriate more by one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars for the maintenance of the Army and the Navy for the next year than any other nation on the globe! And only a few days ago the able Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], backed by the administration and by the votes of the Senate, championed and succeeded in pushing through the Senate a naval measure that will result in the expenditure of a billion dollars before 1936.

Mr. President, I protest against these enormous, unjustifiable appropriations. I object to the appropriation just asked for. I think that the $25,000,000 carried by this bill under the head of aeronautics for the next year is all that should be appropriated, and, in passing, may I say that the policy of the Government in having an aeronautical organization in the Army and another one in the Navy, instead of combining all of the air forces, leads to waste and extravagance, and to increased appropriations.

When this matter has been disposed of, I shall move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to the committee to reduce the appropriations by 10 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

RENOMINATION OF VICE PRESIDENT CURTIS

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have the very great pleasure of announcing that the Republican National Convention at Chicago has just renominated for Vice President our distinguished Presiding Officer. [Great applause, the Senators rising.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the country accepts a Republican Vice President—the indications are that it will not—I am sure that we on this side of the Chamber will be pleased to have the present occupant continue in his place; but God save the country from another Republican administration! [Laughter.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 55, line 15, after the word "plants," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That hereafter such amount of work required by the several departments and independent establishments of the Federal Government, of the kind which heretofore has been let in whole or in part to private contractors, shall be assigned to the several navy yards, arsenals, Coast Guard stations, or other industrial plants owned and operated by the Federal Government, in accordance with which of these several Government establishments are best equipped to perform such work on an economical basis, as will insure the employment of not less than the maximum number of employees in such several trades and occupations as were employed at these several Government plants during the fiscal years 1931 and 1932.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise to make a point of order against the amendment just read.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the amendment which has been read at the desk is, in the strictest sense of the word, an amendment in the interest of economy at this time. Spending as largely as we do to maintain the Navy, I can not understand why any Senator would object to the furtherance of an amendment which would provide the largest possible amount of this appropriation being expended to maintain employment and to accomplish a work for the Navy Department for the least possible money.

Under the present conditions prevailing in the navy yards particularly, a great deal of work which could be done by the men employed by the navy yards is being contracted and let out to private corporations, so that instead of using these appropriations of ours really to maintain labor and afford employment for labor, we let a large part of the work be sublet, and instead of paying for labor we pay profits to the General Electric or the Westinghouse or to others.

The amendment which I have offered would merely provide for the doing of the work in building for the Navy in the navy yards themselves, so far as possible, and I hope the amendment may prevail.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this amendment provides that all work done in any of the departments of the Government which can be done in the navy yards shall be done there. It is clearly new legislation and would mean the setting up of the Government in competition with private industry. I therefore make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in behalf of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] and myself I send to the desk and offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, between lines 2 and 3, the Senators from Pennsylvania propose to insert the following:

Naval hospital, Philadelphia, Pa.: To continue construction of the public works authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works at Philadelphia, Pa., and for other purposes," approved February 12, 1931 (46 Stat. 1091), subject to the limit of cost fixed by such act, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to expend $1,000,000 from the naval hospital fund for the buildings, equipment, accessories, and appurtenances authorized by such act, in addition to the expenditures authorized from such fund by such act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I intend to raise a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not do that until I make an explanation.

Mr. KING. I wanted the Senator to understand that I intended to raise the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this would not add one cent to the appropriations carried by the bill. It would authorize the expenditure to be made solely from the hospital fund which now exists. That hospital fund at present amounts to about a million and a quarter dollars, and will be increased this year by about $800,000. It is not Government money at all. It is raised by a contribution by about 20 cents per month from every officer and enlisted man of the Navy. In other words, this amendment does not call for the spending of any money out of the Federal Treasury.

The naval hospital which it is proposed to start with this money is most urgently needed. At present there are over 500 patients up there, in buildings which are veritable fire traps, war-time, temporary construction, half-rotted away, 34 buildings made out of laths covered with stucco. A single match or cigarette would be enough to start a fire which would burn any one of the buildings, and the consequences of a fire there are almost unthinkable.

The hospital land has already been bought, the plans have already been made and approved, and everything is waiting for the work to be begun. It is a necessary part of a navy yard which will be permanent, under any scheme of naval defense. If Senators could see the condition of that present hospital, Mr. President, I know that their hearts would go out to the men who are confined there.

This appropriation was authorized by an act of Congress approved February 12, 1931; it has been approved by the Secretary of the Navy, it has been approved by the Director of the Budget, it has been approved by the President, who sent a special message to the House of Representatives last March approving this amendment in exactly the words in which I have submitted it. It is not new legislation. It is already covered by the act of February, 1931. It is not doing violence to our Budget system, because it has the full approval of the Director of the Budget and of the President.

From the bottom of my heart, Mr. President, I do assure the Senate that this appropriation is terribly needed. I should feel my share of the guilt if there should be a fire in that place.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. My information was—and it may be erroneous—that the matter had been considered by the committee, and that they had declined to act favorably upon the proposition.

Mr. REED. That is quite true. I went before the committee and appealed to them as strongly as I could. When I left them it seemed to be practically the unanimous sentiment of the committee that it was the wise and proper course to take. Subsequently they seemed to have felt that they could not do it.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. KING. Is there any controversy as to the availability of this fund for this particular purpose? Has it been earmarked, so to speak, for this hospital, instead of some other naval hospital?

Mr. REED. It has not been earmarked for any other hospital, but the Secretary of the Navy, who has charge of the administration of it, approved the application of this much of the fund to this particular work.

Mr. KING. The reason why I propounded that inquiry was that it was suggested to me that there was some uncertainty as to whether this hospital, in preference to some other, should receive this fund.

Mr. REED. No; I do not think there is that question. It was suggested in the debate in the House that some of the funds might well be spent at Parris Island, S. C., and some at Pensacola; but whatever may be the future fate of those stations, there can be no question but that the navy yard at League Island will be maintained, and everybody in the naval administration admits that.

In addition to these naval phases, it should be borne in mind that this is the only hospital for general treatment of veterans in that part of the State of Pennsylvania. There is a veterans' hospital in eastern Pennsylvania for neuropsychiatric cases. There is no general hospital there, and the Veterans' Bureau is using this hospital almost to a greater extent than is the Navy. Every veterans' association in Pennsylvania has appealed to us to get this work started. The veterans themselves individually have appealed to us literally by the thousands. It is closer to the hearts of the veterans of that part of the country than is the bonus bill, which we are to act on to-morrow, because this deals with men who are desperately in need of the service which the hospital renders, and who at present might just as well be lodged in a box of matches, as far as the fire hazard goes.

I know that my colleague Senator DAVIS is thoroughly familiar with this hospital and the need, and I know I am speaking his views as well as my own when I urge the Senate to let this amendment go into the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am wholly sympathetic with what he seeks to do, but I would like to inquire why the committee turned it down.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said is quite true. The President did send up a Budget message recommending this appropriation, and the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the House committee, I believe, and favored the appropriation. When the question came over to the Senate I was in sympathy personally with the appropriation and am still, but the committee, in considering the matter, in their desire for economy, cut it out. While it is perfectly true that the appropriation for this year of a million dollars will come out of the naval hospital fund, and not out of the Government, this is only the start of the building. It is going to cost over $3,000,000 to build that hospital, and the rest of the money will have to come in future years out of regular appropriations. I think it ought to. I think the hospital ought to be built. I think unquestionably the present hospital is in very bad condition and needs to be fixed up, but the committee, in their desire for economy, decided not to take it up this year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I can not subscribe to a kind of economy that does not provide decent hospital facilities for such men as are in that hospital; and so, whether it is a question of economy or whether it is not, if the situation is such as has been described by the Senator from Pennsylvania—and I take that as absolute—we ought, it seems to me, to adopt his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me detain the Senate for just a minute to give literally a description of this hospital as testified to in the House by Representative DARROW, of Philadelphia. We all know Mr. DARROW, and we all know that he is scrupulously careful in his statements; and if this description of the hospital does not touch the heart of the Senate, nothing can. Representative DARROW said this to his colleagues, as appears at page 8732 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I want to give you, if I may, a brief description of the present hospital buildings. There are 34 in number. They are of a very flimsy wooden-type construction, mostly stucco on wood laths, built for war-time emergencies. They are built on wooden piles, about two feet or two and a half feet from the ground. They have been decaying so rapidly that the sills are rotting away. The buildings are sagging, and in many instances the heating pipes and plumbing have been disconnected.

Think of putting men who are desperately sick in such hovels in zero weather; and that is what we have been doing. I repeat the last sentence:

> The buildings are sagging, and in many instances the heating pipes and plumbing have been disconnected. Captain Dennis told me a few days ago that when he visited these buildings in September last during a heavy rain he saw the patients eating in the mess hall with umbrellas over them to keep from getting wet.

Sick men, to whom this country owes everything, eating in a mess hall with umbrellas over them to keep from getting wet! Mr. DARROW continued:

> The buildings being grouped closely together, and because of this flimsy construction, we have there one of the greatest fire hazards of which you can conceive. Should a fire break out, the loss of life, I am afraid, would be appalling.

I will not detain the Senate further. I have painted the picture in Representative DARROW's words.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, may I inquire why this condition has been allowed to go on continuously without bringing in some bill to take care of it, so it would not be necessary to take it out of the naval appropriations?

Mr. REED. We have brought in a bill. We had the bill passed last February.

Mr. DILL. This item certainly does not belong in this bill.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; it is a naval hospital.

Mr. DILL. But not a part of the Navy Department appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. Yes; it is authorized. What we are trying to get is an appropriation, so we can go on and build it for the Navy. The House, after it heard the statement just read, adopted the amendment in Committee of the Whole and then, for some reason which I can not fathom, struck it out when the bill was in the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I inquire of the Senator how many men are in the hospital?

Mr. REED. There are something over 500. Of course the number fluctuates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there no other Government hospital to which they could be transferred?

Mr. REED. Nothing closer than the naval hospital here in Washington.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Could they be transferred here?

Mr. REED. There is no room for them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much does it lack of having the necessary room?

Mr. REED. There is a hospital in Brooklyn near the navy yard, but there is no room there.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Could they not be divided between the two?

Mr. REED. There are not vacant beds enough.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much do the two other institutions of that character lack of having sufficient room for the men in this hospital?

Mr. REED. I do not know that precisely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Pennsylvania to correct the bad conditions in the Philadelphia hospital, but I would like to have a little more information before I vote on the amendment. First of all, I would like to inquire what land is to be sounded, referred to in the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Maine on behalf of the committee? Is it the site for the same hospital?

Mr. HALE. Yes; it is the same hospital.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is there some question about the site being suitable for a permanent building?

Mr. HALE. They are putting up some permanent buildings which were authorized last year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may have misunderstood the amendment, but I thought it was for the purpose of testing the subsurface formation.

Mr. HALE. That was appropriated for last year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For what purpose?

Mr. HALE. For the purpose of getting the site.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought it had some reference to sounding.

Mr. HALE. That is all in connection with the site.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I listened to the description read by the Senator from Pennsylvania as made by one of the Representatives from Philadelphia in the House. He stated that the piles on which these buildings have been located are rotting off. The Senator from Maine offered on behalf of the committee an amendment, as I understood it, to test-drill the site, and I want to ascertain whether there is any question about the present site being suitable for the erection of permanent buildings.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this land which has been acquired by the Government for a site is on the peninsula which lies between the Delaware River and the Schuylkill River. It is alluvial soil. There is no question about its ability to sustain a building of any size. Buildings 20 stories high are carried on exactly similar ground. But there is a question as to how deep the foundation must run, which must be determined before the architects can make definite plans. They must sink test holes, just as they do in Washington, to find out how deep the foundation should be set. It is what we have in every case where the rock outcrop is not known.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I judge from the statement, however, that if the piles are rotting off, there must be a good deal of subsurface water on this particular site.

Mr. REED. We saw the same thing exactly taking place in the temporary Government buildings now occupied by the Navy Department down on the Ellipse.

Mr. SMOOT. We had to replace nearly all of them once and some of them twice.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now I want to ask about another matter. What is this hospital fund to which the enlisted and the commissioned personnel have been contributing? How was it established, and for what purpose?

Mr. REED. I will let the Senator from Maine answer that question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while the Senator from Maine is getting his data I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question, if I may have his attention, in regard to a statement made a moment ago. I understood from that statement that $1,000,000 is not all that will be required. There is $200,000 already in the bill——

Mr. REED. No; we have previously raised $300,000, $200,000 for the site which has been acquired—and incidentally was acquired at less than the appropriation by $60,000—and then $100,000 for the plant which has been completed and approved. There is no money carried by the present bill for this building.

Mr. KING. I understood from the statement made that the $1,000,000 is only a beginning and that $2,000,000 more will be required to be appropriated.

Mr. REED. Yes; ultimately the building will cost $3,000,000.

Mr. KING. Who pays the balance besides the $1,000,000?

Mr. REED. The United States Government some day will pay it, but we are not proposing to spend that now.

Mr. KING. If we start with $1,000,000, then obviously the Government will step in as soon as that is expended and complete the building, and that will cost $2,000,000 more.

Mr. REED. If we can afford it, I am going to ask that the balance be appropriated next year. If we can not afford it, we will have to wait.

Now, if I may answer the Senator from Wisconsin, by an old act passed in the eighteenth century, somewhere along about 1797 or 1798, it was provided that this 20-cent deduction should be made from the pay of everybody in the Navy to build up a hospitalization fund. The Senator from Maine doubtless knows the details much better than I.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Maine for an answer to my question about the hospital fund.

Mr. HALE. At one time the naval hospital fund had $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in it. The fund is now raised entirely through the 20 cents per month which is deducted from the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, as the Senator from Pennsylvania stated, and from fines and forfeitures. In this way they get a little more than $1,000,000 a year. The large fund of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 has been reduced by building hospitals and taking care of hospitals around the country, so it has been reduced to about $1,250,000 at the present time. If we take the $1,000,000 out for the purpose of this amendment, the fund will go down to about $250,000, but during the year will be built up at the rate of about $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Pennsylvania what proportion of the patients in the Philadelphia Naval Hospital are ex-service men and what proportion are now in the service?

Mr. REED. Seventy-five or 80 per cent of them are ex-service men put there by the Veterans' Bureau. There is a great advantage in that because while the hospital is run quite as well as a Veterans' Bureau hospital, it is run at a cost of about 93 cents per man per day less than the Veterans' Bureau hospital. The Navy is giving just as good care and giving it for less money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The only question that I have concerning the source from which the Senator is getting the $1,000,000 is that it does not seem equitable for the Government of the United States to take contributions or deductions from the pay of enlisted and commissioned personnel in the Navy and use the money to build a hospital to hospitalize veterans of a previous war. I regard the care of ex-service men as a responsibility of the Government and not the responsibility of enlisted men and commissioned officers in the active service of the Navy.

Mr. REED. There are two answers to that. The first is that if the Government provides the $1,700,000 necessary to complete this hospital at some future time, then the active members of the Navy at the present time will be contributing about the same proportion to the total cost as that proportion of the use which they get of it.

Secondly, after all, this is not our money. It is the money of these members of the Navy, and they themselves want to use it and have it spent in this way. Actually, we are not being very generous. We are letting the Navy have a hospital at the expense of its own men.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is just the point. It seemed to me, in view of the fact that the veterans are using about 75 per cent of the bed space in the hospital, that an appropriation should be made out of the Treasury to build the new hospital rather than taking it from the fund contributed by the active personnel of the Navy for their own hospital purposes.

Mr. HALE. I think all the naval hospitals to-day receive veterans.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but my impression is that there is not such a large percentage of ex-service men in the other naval hospitals as in this one, which is really taking the place of a veterans' hospital that should be constructed in that part of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. To a certain extent that is true, but there is a very amicable system of cooperation between the hospitals. For instance, Walter Reed is purely an Army hospital, but it always has some veterans there under treatment. It is in the interest of the men themselves, but I can assure the Senator that the presence of veterans in that naval hospital will never be permitted to exclude active Navy personnel that needs to be taken in. They will always be received.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not had a chance to look it up recently, but many times when the veterans of the World War are given hospitalization in a hospital not owned by the Government of the United States, we pay so much per patient to those hospitals. I do not know whether that is the case with this particular hospital or not.

Mr. REED. Yes; it is. The Veterans' Bureau pays the Navy Department for the daily care of these patients.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that, but it is proposed to take capital out of this fund contributed by the active personnel of the Navy and use it to build hospital facilities in Philadelphia, 75 per cent of which will be used by veterans. The question of upkeep and maintenance it seems to me is not involved. As I understand it there are other naval hospitals in need of new buildings and I would much prefer if the Senator would offer an amendment to appropriate the money directly out of the Treasury, because I believe it is an obligation of the Government to maintain proper hospital facilities. While I am just as anxious as he to see these unsafe buildings replaced by permanent structures, I think it unfair to appropriate it from a fund contributed by the active personnel of the Navy on the plea that the Government is too poor to make the contribution from the Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I would like to be permitted to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question: Does the appropriation supersede or will it result in superseding or interfering in any way with the hospitalization program of the Veterans' Commission which is now considering these matters?

Mr. REED. No; it is not in conflict with it in any way. It does not change it in any way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the diversion of this fund to this building activity over there take $1,000,000 out of the fund to be used for the hospitalization of the Navy personnel?

Mr. REED. It takes it out of the naval hospital fund, but we are assured by the Secretary of the Navy that the receipts will restore the fund before the end of the year.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It will not curtail the opportunity of providing hospital facilities for the use of the personnel of the Navy?

Mr. REED. I am sure that it will not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, many patriotic persons disagree as to the wisdom and even as to the righteousness of the House bill 7726, the so-called bonus bill. I believe that the bonus bill is righteous and just, but I am able to perceive that men whose intellectual processes are equal and probably superior to my own take the other view.

I am displeased at the remissness and delay that have characterized action relative to House bill 7726. We should have voted upon that bill yesterday, and the Senate ought to be diligent and vote on that bill to-day or at least to-morrow before meridian.

No matter how greatly men may disagree—and honest and patriotic men will continue to disagree—respecting the bonus or adjusted compensation bill, I can not permit this occasion to go by without saying a word respecting this amendment. I am for it with all my heart. One of the reasons why the country has practically demanded the passage of the bonus bill is because, arduous as have been the labors of Congress and great as have been the services of General Hines, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, we have been somewhat remiss, somewhat negligent, with respect to the hospitalization of our ex-service men.

An esteemed Senator asks, What do I mean? I mean this: I shall not name the State, and I shall not name the institution, but not more than five years ago a public institution was destroyed by fire and more than 200 helpless men were incinerated. The Senators from Pennsylvania tell us, and the record shows, that the present facilities and buildings at the proposed hospitals are flimsy, inflammable, and susceptible to fire at any moment, with 400 or 500 sick and disabled men in the institution. That appeals to me; I am sure it will appeal to every Senator.

It is a solemn obligation, in my judgment, that the Government owes, and from which it can not honorably escape, to hospitalize, so far as science and money may hospitalize, sick soldiers. Then possibly after we shall have done our full duty in that regard Senators may not find such a demand for what we call a "bonus." Mr. President, can you blame men who are ill—who need hospitalization, and the Government not furnishing proper facilities—for demanding their bonus or their adjusted compensation?

Mr. President, I conclude with the hope this amendment may be adopted. Then I hope the Senate, with equal courage and diligence, will proceed to vote upon the adjusted compensation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on behalf of himself and his colleague.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has been trying to secure recognition for some time and is now recognized.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Arizona that I have been a Member of the Senate for 30 years and during that time I have never seen a bill that has been handled so rapidly as has the bonus bill. It came to the Senate from the House late yesterday afternoon and was immediately referred to the Finance Committee. It could not have been passed at that time because it reached here at about the hour of adjournment. But the Finance Committee met this morning at 9.30, the bill was reported to the Senate, and a unanimous-consent agreement was asked for its consideration a few minutes after 11 o'clock.

Unanimous consent was not granted. So the bill has to go over until to-morrow, but the first thing in the morning I shall make a motion to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to suggest also that the objection to consideration was made by a friend of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, time will not permit me to make a lengthy statement concerning the pending amendment, nor, indeed, do I think such a statement necessary, for I think conditions now existing at the Philadelphia Navy Yard are understood by Senators and that they are satisfied that the work on the hospital there should begin at once. I should like, however, to make the further observation that unless a new hospital building shall be erected at the Philadelphia Navy Yard—on rainy days, such as this, when men are admitted to the hospital they will have to carry with them umbrellas in order to afford them shelter during the time they may be compelled to remain in the hospital.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on behalf of himself and his colleague.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have a short amendment, which before offering I desire to explain. I would not offer the amendment if it were not for the fact that the chairman of the committee himself to-day has repeatedly offered amendments which were out of order if a point of order had been made. I recognize that if a point of order shall be made against the amendment I am about to offer, it may be held out of order, but I want to appeal to the chairman of the committee not to make a point of order against it. In any event I desire to make a brief statement concerning it.

The amendment proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish material to pave a street along the navy-yard grounds at Bremerton, Wash. The street there is unpaved, and in the summer months it is extremely dusty and in the winter months it is muddy.

Under the laws of the State and the city the only way that payment can be made for the paving is through assessments on the abutting property. The abutting property on one side of the street is the navy yard and on the other side of the street is owned by private interests. The private-property owners are entirely willing to pay their share of the expense of paving the street.

The amendment proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish, out of materials in possession of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, sufficient material to pave the part of the street along the navy yard not to exceed one-half of the cost and in no case to exceed $11,000. In addition to making this street more usable it will furnish work during the coming fall and winter for some men there who will be out of work because the navy yard will lay them off after affording them work for some months. I now offer the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator referred to my offering amendments which were subject to points of order. I have not done so except in the case of amendments which I have been instructed by the committee to offer.

In the present case the amendment offered by the Senator came before the Committee on Appropriations; the committee looked into it and found that it was not recommended by the Bureau of the Budget nor was it recommended by the department. Therefore, with all sympathy for the Senator and the cause he represents, I do not very well see how the amendment can go into this bill.

Mr. DILL. The amendment will not require any additional appropriation; it only proposes the use of some material which the Bureau of Yards and Docks has on hand, and I trust the Senator will not raise a point of order against it but will let it go to conference. It may be that it will not be retained in conference, but I think the Senator ought to let it be considered there. It is a matter that is in the interest of the Government. The improvement has been needed for years. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 37, line 2, after the figures "$8,400,000," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to furnish to the city of Bremerton, Wash., material for paving Burwell Avenue where there is property of the navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash., abutting said avenue, to cost not to exceed $11,000, nor to exceed one-half of the total cost of paving such sections of said avenue.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the work contemplated can not be very expensive; it can not be much of a burden. A similar provision was included in the appropriation bill in 1911 when $1,000 was allowed for a sidewalk under similar circumstances; so that it is not anything new. There are amendments now in this bill against which points of order would have laid; and it seems to me that by accepting this amendment the Senator from Maine will not be violating any great tradition of his position and will be acting in harmony with the attitude which has been evidenced toward him here to-day in the case of his own amendments by those of us who might have made points of order. I appeal to the Senator to let the amendment go to conference.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is so very persuasive that I will not make the point of order against the amendment, but I will not vote in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 42, line 15, to strike out "$269,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$284,130."

The purpose of the amendment is this: As the bill is drawn, five civilian professors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., will be dropped, and a very great hardship will be imposed upon them. I hope the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, so that the Senate may have this matter in mind before a vote on the amendment, I should like to say a few words.

There are five civilian instructors at the Naval Academy. They were appointed after an examination held by the Navy Department. In sending out information to these candidates this paragraph appeared:

Instructors are employed with a provision that their services may be dispensed with after six months' notice. It is only fair to state, however, that this procedure has rarely been invoked in the past, and then only in cases of unsatisfactory service, misconduct, or to make a necessary reduction in force. In general, civilian instructors remain at the Naval Academy for long periods; for example, the junior professor at present in the department of modern languages, has been employed for 8 years, while the senior professor has been employed for 23 years.

These civilian instructors, Mr. President, were estimated for by the Bureau of the Budget, but the House reduced this item $28,913, and the $15,130 involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is for the purpose of paying the salaries of these instructors. They had no notice that they were to be dismissed until after the time when normally college contracts are made for the ensuing year.

Certainly in view of these instructions the Government is under a moral obligation, at least, to give them six months' notice with pay, which would reduce the saving in this item at least 50 per cent, making the net saving only $7,565.

These men have come to the academy feeling secure in the tenure of their employment. They have bought homes. Some of them have been paying for them on the installment plan. They do not receive large salaries. I think the largest salary is $3,000, and the others are less than that. To cut off these men without notice of any kind, and after the time when teachers may ordinarily hope to secure contracts for college employment as instructors, seems to me a cruelty in which this Government should not indulge.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland will only carry these men through one ensuing fiscal year. In justice to these men and to their families, and to save them from this cruel hardship, and the loss in some instances of all the savings and property which they have in this world, I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

One of the men in question brought to my attention the other day the fact that a short while ago he had been offered another position, which he had declined, not having had any notice that he was likely to be dropped by action of the Senate or the House. Having done that, as the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, he is practically precluded from getting another position now, because we all know that instructors are usually employed in the spring for the year that follows, opening in the fall.

If these men were to receive only a cut in salary, like other Government employees, I should not rise to protest, but their complete livelihood is likely to be taken away from them for a year.

Furthermore, if a great saving were involved in this matter, I think we would give it more serious consideration, but when the amount is so trivial and when the complete employment of these men is to be taken from them when they have gone along upon the assumption that they would be regularly employed there, and many of them have bought homes, to withhold from them now this small day of grace, this opportunity to make a readjustment and to dispose of their property seems to me to be little short of cruelty.

If we had notified them away last winter that this action was likely to be taken, that would be one thing. To come here at the end of the school year, however, a couple of months before the new school year opens, and tell them that they are out of employment entirely for a year in all likelihood, in view of the fact that we save only a few thousand dollars, seems to me to be unwarranted.

I appeal to the fairness of Members on both sides of the aisle not to put the stamp of approval on such action as that. There are only about seven or eight of these men, as I recall; and, as I stated a moment ago, some of them have lately declined opportunities for other employment next year because they took it for granted that they would be carried on next year.

I know that the Superintendent of the Naval Academy would like to have these men retained. Their service has been efficient; and I ask the Senate to help us get a majority vote on the amendment of my colleague as no more than simple justice to a small group of men who will be the victims of circumstances, and very sad circumstances indeed, if they lose an entire year of employment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. If these men should be displaced, would other men be employed to take their positions?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator in all frankness that, in my judgment, it is possible for the academy to get along, perhaps, without these men; but I can say with equal honesty that it can not get along without a serious handicap. I know that the services of these men are needed, and that the instruction force down there has already been reduced considerably, many civilian employees having been let out some time ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The commandant of the academy testified that the academy could absorb this reduction in teaching force by changing the curriculum, by cutting down the length of time certain studies, which these men are teaching, are given under the curriculum as it exists to-day.

The fact is, however, as the Senator from Utah will perhaps remember, that these men were originally obtained when a very large class came into the academy. While it is true that the present "plebe" class will be reduced as a result of those preceding larger classes there are still large classes in what would ordinarily be called the sophomore, junior, and senior college years. Therefore, these men may very well be used for one more year in helping to care for the larger classes which have come into the institution.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, may I say further to the Senator from Utah, who has asked a very pertinent question, that I have been inclined to support almost every bit of economy that I could, often with the knowledge that there were some injustices in it; but after the school year is up, and when these men have no opportunity to make connections for the next year, in view of the fact that they already own their homes and have their families there and it will be practically impossible for them to relocate, what could be more unfair than to notify them that they will not have any positions at all next fall?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will in just a second, because I want to yield to the Senator from Utah.

In addition to that, from the investigation that I have made I understand that these instructors are needed; and while, of course, the Naval Academy will adapt itself to anything Congress passes, it will do so with reluctance, because I am advised on the best of authority that these instructors are a real necessity.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to say to the Senator that the argument which has been made in favor of the amendment I think justifies the Senate in adopting it, but I desire to make this observation:

A number of years ago I was appointed to visit the academy, as Senators are, and have gone there quite frequently. I have appointed quite a number of young men to the academy. From the investigations made, and from statements made to me, I have reached the conclusion that economies could have been introduced in the past, and possibly at present, that have not been introduced; in other words, that we have been too extravagant in the appropriations made for the Naval Academy. I believe that to be the case from investigations made and from complaints; but the argument in favor of this amendment, I think, is irresistible.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very glad to know that the Senator feels like supporting the amendment; and I certainly hope that other Senators likewise will not permit this injustice to be perpetrated on a lot of innocent men.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, regardless of whether these civilian instructors are needed or not, I do not think the United States Government can afford to treat people in the way proposed in this bill. I would not treat a darkey farmhand on my plantation in any such manner as that.

Therefore, I am going to vote to keep these people, whether they are needed or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 12, line 15, was adopted. That amendment increases the appropriation passed by the House from $3,077,686 to $3,727,686, or an increase of $650,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am advised by examination of the report of the committee that this increase is to provide a cruise during the coming summer for the Naval Reserve, which, I understand, includes the graduates from the Naval Academy and the reserve naval officers.

Under normal conditions I should have no objection to that appropriation. We started out here, however, with a brave front on the subject of reducing the costs of government; and I think on every direct vote of the Senate on that subject the Appropriations Committee was directed to decrease by 10 per cent the aggregate amount of appropriations as finally passed by the House of Representatives.

That was done in one or two bills. Then we found, by force of the pursuasive arguments of those in charge of the appropriation bills, that the determination of Members of the Senate upon that subject broke down; and in this bill there is a reduction below the appropriation made in the House of only 2½ per cent.

It seems to me that this is an item which, under our campaign for a reduction in the cost of government, should not be included in this bill. The House of Representatives doubtless rejected it.

I have heard a great many speeches here on the subject of economy in Government and revenue bills, but practically all of the arguments I have heard have been in favor of levying new taxes upon the consumers of our country. I have heard Senator after Senator—and I say this in no critical sense, because they have as much right to their viewpoint as I have to mine—stand here day after day pleading for the poor Federal employees. I heard a Senator stand upon this floor and say it was absolutely inhuman to remove anyone from the Federal pay roll at this time and add him to the great mass of the unemployed. I heard the same Senator stand here and say that he was opposed to reducing the salary of a single Federal employee, and in his next speech he said he was as much interested in economy as any Member of the Senate.

He opposed reducing the number of employees; he opposed any reduction in salaries. Now we find an item which falls under neither classification, an item which merely dispenses with a cruise upon American battleships to different sections of the world. There may be some training in that item, but I submit to Members of the Senate who have their minds to some degree upon the taxpayers of America, upon the great average consuming public of America, that if we are to protect the salaries of Federal employees, if we are to protect their number, than in fairness I submit that we must look to places where we can at least dispense with services which are not essential; in order to make some decent reductions in the cost of government under these trying circumstances.

Senators may differ with me, but in my judgment we have not given sufficient thought and sufficient attention to the great cry that is coming up from every section of the United States to reduce the costs of government, to levy less taxes upon the people at this time.

We blandly accept the recommendations of the committee who have fallen into the attitude of being sympathetic with the departments, and with the recommendations of the Cabinet members and their bureau chiefs, but I say to Senators that we must get away from that attitude, and if we do not make more reductions at this session than I see in sight, I predict that there will be a reversal of this attitude when the next Congress comes here fresh from an election, fresh from a protesting people, fresh from an electorate indignant, and denouncing all the Members of the Congress in the aggregate, denouncing Congress itself, for thinking little of the taxpayers and the consumers and too much of the bureaus and departments and the Federal employees of this Government. I predict that when Members of Congress go back and get in touch with their constituents, they are going to find it most difficult to explain the action of Congress in not making much larger reductions in the costs of government than have even been attempted by those responsible for appropriation bills.

Mr. President, I have moved to reconsider the vote by which this item was agreed to, in the hope that the Senate will not add that additional tax of $650,000 upon the people of the United States at this time, when the item is not in any way essential to our national defense.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before the question on the motion of the Senator from Alabama is put I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Maine, in charge of this bill.

It had been my purpose to ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment proposed by the committee, on page 13 of the bill, was agreed to. The amendment proposed by the committee follows the amendment to which the Senator from Alabama has referred, and if the amendment on page 13 is reconsidered, then the whole matter may be discussed, and I think the Senator from Maine would be convinced that the House text ought to be restored, and the Senate committee amendment defeated.

I am going to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he will not withhold his motion, so that I may ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 13 was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could not hear the Senator, and did not understand the significance of his remarks.

Mr. BLAINE. The significance is this, that the increase in the appropriation has reference to the Naval Reserve. I am asking that the vote by which the amendment on page 13 was agreed to be reconsidered, and if that vote is reconsidered, then I desire to present facts which I think ought to convince the Senate that the House provision should prevail, and then, as a matter of course, the proposal of the Senator from Alabama would follow and ought to prevail.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator and agree to that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his motion to reconsider temporarily.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have already told the Senator from Wisconsin that I had no objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 13 was agreed to. I will be very glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 13 was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maine, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, moved to strike out on page 13, after the word "Naval Reserves," in line 4, the following proviso:

Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer evidence which I think is convincing, given to me by a member of the United States Naval Reserve. This man has served for 15 years. He now occupies the rank of lieutenant commander. He served in the World War.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator give the name of the officer?

Mr. BLAINE. I scarcely feel privileged to give the name of the officer in the Naval Reserve who has conveyed this information to me confidentially, for the reason that his position might be jeopardized if the name were disclosed on the Senate floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the man is coming with objection to what other officers in the reserve are asking for, he at least ought to have the courage to step out in the open.

Mr. BLAINE. This man is a man of courage. I know him. I know him well. I have known him for years. I know that he had the courage to serve in the World War. I know that he has been a member of the United States Naval Reserve for 15 years. I know that now he occupies the rank of lieutenant commander in the United States Naval Reserve. I know that what he says in his communication to me outlines the situation exactly as it is, and if the Senator from Maine has any different information which controverts the facts which I propose to disclose, and which have been brought to me by this officer now serving in the United States Naval Reserve, of course we will be privileged to have that information.

Mr. President, as the information comes to me, a large number of captains and commanders of the reserve are in active duty the year around, drawing salaries, including their allowances, of from six to seven thousand dollars a year for captains.

Mr. KING. Per man?

Mr. BLAINE. Six to seven thousand dollars a year, including their allowances. That about $5,500 goes to commanders doing practically nothing which could not be done by lieutenants drawing less than $3,000 a year, or by officers of the regular Navy who would be drawing their regular Navy pay.

The fact is that there are five captains on active duty the year around commanding training vessels on the Great Lakes who sail a ship just six weeks each year. They draw their pay when those vessels are frozen in the ice for nearly seven months, when civilian vessel owners lay their ships up, with no one aboard but a watchman. That is the testimony of this lieutenant commander in the United States Naval Reserve.

That is not all. He also states, which is a fact, that there are five vessels, old cruisers, which have been brought onto the Lakes to train reservists. Referring to those vessels, this officer states that they are totally unfit for training purposes. He calls attention to the fact that under our treaty with England we can not carry guns on those ships, and, therefore, there is no training, as he says, in that most important feature of a Navy man's duties. They carry no torpedoes. Their engines and their boilers are antiquated and furnish no training to men who must go to modern Navy ships with high-speed engines.

He also states that regular Navy officers have condemned training on the Great Lakes, but there has been a certain influence to which he refers, political influence, which has prevented the Navy Department from withdrawing those ships and sending the officers and the men to the coasts, where training can be given on the vessels upon which they would have to work, and in the duties they would have to perform if called to service in an emergency or war.

Furthermore, the United States Navy gives each officer of the regular Navy two years' shore duty out of every four years' service. Its greatest problem is to find places ashore where they can be placed. Those regular Navy officers are schooled and experienced in training men and could be put on this duty on the Great Lakes without any cost to the Government other than their regular pay, which they draw anyway, as the officer states it. With reserve officers in command, "it is a case of the blind leading the blind." I quote him literally.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not quite understand who those persons were who commanded the ship. Were they regular Navy officers or were they reserve officers?

Mr. BLAINE. They are reserve officers. On the Great Lakes there are five old cruisers, which, of course, are inadequate for training purposes, as this officer points out. There are five officers who command those ships, which ships sail only six weeks a year, and all the balance of the year those officers may be idle. Yet they draw all the way from $5,500 to $6,000 or $7,000 a year.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, why does not the Senator offer an amendment providing that no part of the appropriation carried in this bill shall be used for the maintenance of these vessels upon the Great Lakes?

Mr. BLAINE. That is substantially the language adopted by the House, at least as it affects the officers. The Senate struck it out. I am endeavoring now to have the House text remain in the bill.

This officer calls attention to the fact that—

> The cost of this undertaking is upwards of $300,000 a year to operate the Lake training ships over and above the pay of men in training. On the east and the west coast the Naval Reserve takes training on the vessels of the regular Navy. So should those located on the Lakes.

He further states:

> If it is urged that officers of high rank are required because of experience, safety, etc., it should be remembered that an officer must serve from 8 to 10 years before he can get the rank of lieutenant and if he can not navigate one of these ships by that time the whole scheme of the reserve is a useless waste of money.

So, as this United States Naval Reserve officer points out, these five old cruisers can furnish no training of any consequence and yet they are manned by reserve officers drawing these high salaries, who spend but a small portion of their time on the ships in the service of the Government of the United States, and therefore the House, perceiving that situation, adopted the text which provides that—

> No appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty and/or performance of 15 days' active training duty.

If the Senate rejects the committee amendment then the House text will stand as I have read it, and motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] should prevail and thereby make a reduction of over $600,000 in the appropriation. I trust I have made it clear to the Senate just what the proposition is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. KING. If we shall reinstate the House text by rejecting the committee amendment, will that effectuate the object which the Senator has in view, if I interpret his remarks correctly, of preventing any further naval training upon these old boats upon the Great Lakes?

Mr. BLAINE. That will be largely the case unless the boats are commanded by officers of lower rank. It is contemplated that the United States Naval Reserve activities on the Great Lakes are quite useless. I appreciate that my State has two Great Lakes bordering it—Lake Michigan and Lake Superior. I have no interest in the matter from the standpoint of locality except as it is pointed out by the lieutenant commander, an officer of the United States Naval Reserve, whom I know very well and who lives in that section of our country. I am accepting his statement because I know him to be a very honorable gentleman, a splendid citizen, who has had service in the United States Naval Reserve for the past 15 years, and who is now a member of that reserve, and who had service during the World War.

Mr. KING. I am interested in this matter for the reason that a year ago some officer of the Navy—I believe he was, at any rate he was a person familiar with naval activities—called my attention to the activities upon the Great Lakes. He stated that it was as useless to have those boats operated and the activities continued as it would be in the Army, by way of comparison, to send boys out to learn the art of war and give them no guns, but to put them out in some valley a few of them at a time where there was no chance of mobilization for Army maneuvers. He thought we ought to abolish entirely the naval activities upon the Great Lakes.

Mr. BLAINE. This is not the abolishment of the United States Naval Reserve. It is simply limiting the United States Naval Reserve to that sort of training where there can be actual training upon vessels equipped with such equipment as may be necessary to make sailors and officers in time of emergency of war.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator quoted from one Naval Reserve officer from that section of the country. Has he heard from any others?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it not a fact that the Naval Reserve as a whole in that area is emphatically in favor of the maintenance of training upon the Great Lakes as an efficiency measure in respect to their responsibilities?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no knowledge of what may be the opinion of United States Naval Reserve officers, but the facts as presented by this United States Naval Reserve officer to my mind is very convincing, notwithstanding what may be the opinion of other Naval Reserve officers. Let me say that he points out, though I have not read that portion of his letter, that there are these five soft jobs for somebody and he thinks in these times of distress, when we are making the tremendous cuts in relation to civilian employees of the Government, that it is about time to cut out five soft snaps for United States Naval Reserve officers. That is frankly about what he said.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have no interest in the five soft snaps and know nothing about them, but I do have a very tremendous interest in the very large Naval Reserve in the Great Lakes States, which is one of the finest and most efficient units of that character in the entire country. In fact, many of the efficiency trophies from year to year have gone into that particular area of the country.

If the proposal which the Senator has in mind is a blow at the efficient training of the Naval Reserve of the central section of the country, I would say it is a very serious blow at the morale and the successful training of the reserve branch of the Navy, which bears the same relationship to the Navy that the National Guard does to the Army. I should hate to see anything of that sort happen.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator's conclusions would be correct if those conclusions corresponded with the facts. But there is no comparison between the United States Naval Reserve on the Great Lakes and the Navy, on the one hand, and the State Militia or National Guard and the Army, on the other hand. The National Guard is trained in camp, with the same equipment, under the same circumstances, and under the same conditions as though they were called into actual service in time of war. In all the military camps the National Guard receives its annual training in all lines of Army service from the medical to the heavy artillery, the tank service, the trench-mortar service, the field service, the engineering service, and so forth.

But what can a naval reservist do on an old cruiser that has no guns and can not carry guns because prohibited by the treaty with Great Britain, that has no torpedoes and can not carry them on the Great Lakes, that has equipment, such as this reserve officer mentioned, of engines and boilers, the operation of which does not give the naval reservist any idea whatever of a cruiser or a battleship or a submarine? There is no comparison respecting the Naval Reserve and the National Guard.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not deny that the relationship of the reserve to the Navy is precisely the same as the relationship of the National Guard to the Army?

Mr. BLAINE. There is that remote relationship, but largely in name.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is a fact.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course there is a relationship, but what is it? The vessels upon the Great Lakes are scarcely more than painted pictures. They serve no purpose whatever in training men. It ought to be obvious to anyone that these old vessels upon the Great Lakes can not afford the naval training necessary for the reservist. This officer to whom I have previously referred very pertinently said:

> I am a member and officer of the United States Naval Reserve with the rank of lieutenant commander. I have taken training each year for 15 years. I served in the late war. I am friendly to the reserve, but I know from a wide experience that training on the Great Lakes is a useless waste of public money, and that it is a waste of money to keep these officers on active duty the year around.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may be entirely correct in his description of the equipment. In whatever degree he is correct, however, the efficiency standing of the Naval Reserve in the Middle West is the more to be complimented and the more to be sustained. The Naval Reserve unit in my home city of Grand Rapids in two different years, the last time I was familiar with the facts, had won the national efficiency test of the United States Naval Reserve from coast to coast, so that there must be something in the training which provides an efficient net result through training on the Lakes in spite of the handicap to which the Senator refers.

If that be true, the greater credit is due in view of the handicaps that have been overcome and the greater the advisability of permitting whatever equipment they have to be continued, it would seem to me.

Mr. BLAINE. With the Senator's usual good judgment and common sense and knowledge of the eternal fitness of things, I would indeed like to have him inform the Senate how any reservist can be trained for the essential service of the Navy upon boats such as must be the character of the boats that are on the Great Lakes. Perhaps they have the land training for the marine service. That is an entirely different thing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am speaking of the Naval Reserve or naval training service, and while I can not enlighten the Senator respecting the curriculum or the equipment, I can state emphatically to him what the net result has been.

Mr. BLAINE. I can very readily appreciate how the reservists in the Marine Corps——

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is not the Marine Corps.

Mr. BLAINE. Might well be trained not upon ships but upon the shore, and, of course, they do not need reserve officers who are drawing the enormous salaries with little work for that particular training, as it can be obtained through the regular channels, through the regular officers of the Navy. But I submit that the testimony as presented by this officer of the United States Naval Reserve, in my opinion, is sufficient justification for the retention of the text as adopted by the other House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HALE. Very well; I yield.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I think there is some assumption here that the naval reserves only operate and are only trained on the Gulf, the Great Lakes, and the seacoast. Quite the contrary is true. In my city of St. Louis, and all up and down the Mississippi River and the Ohio River and even up the Missouri River, the naval reserves are in training. My own city contributed as much as $150,000 to their support. I do not know of a finer body of young men anywhere than these young business men, some of whom served in the Navy during the World War, who give a certain portion of their time each year to active service on the rivers. In addition to that service, they meet three or four times a month; they have classes; they study, and they are trained.

I thought it proper, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the inland waterways are tremendously interested in this naval reserve force. If we will let our minds go back to the Civil War we will recall——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HAWES. Yes; I shall yield to the Senator in just a second—the really decisive battles of that war were fought on the lower Mississippi River. If there shall ever be an invasion of our country by a foreign foe—which I do not think is at all probable—the route will be up the Mississippi Valley or down the Mississippi Valley. We have trained men in the Army; we have our militia; but the naval reserve is a comparatively new departure, and by reason of its activities men are trained for the Navy.

It was discovered, Mr. President, during the late war that some of the finest sailors and marines in our service came from the great Central West. I am sure that that western section and the Mississippi Valley are vitally interested in doing what seems to me to be only the fair thing by these men who give so much of their time and so much of their thought and their energies to the public service.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the proposition I have been discussing has nothing to do with the United States Naval Reserve other than these reserve officers who man the ships merely six weeks during the year, are then idle the remainder of the time, but, nevertheless, receive pay?

If the amendment to which I have referred shall be rejected, and the House text shall be retained, the regular naval officers, who are competent—and a lieutenant is competent for that purpose—will take their places, and the Naval Reserve training, so far as the men in the service are concerned, will continue just the same.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I came in rather late and did not know the specific object of his amendment. There is this thought in connection with that, I will say to the Senator. Militia organizations like to have their own officers; they like to have the officers who are elected by them and commissioned by them; and I presume there is some feeling of that kind to be found in the Naval Reserve.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that when the training camps for the militia throughout the United States have the 3-week period of training the instruction is entirely under regular officers of the United States Army. Of course, there are the officers of the respective companies of the militia; but for the training, for the actual instruction, there are certain officers of the United States Army who are assigned to each camp. That situation will not be affected in case the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I have seen some of the most splendid young fellows learning how to use the rifle, competing as crack pistol shots, carrying on athletics, and doing it for what? Doing it so that they may at a critical period, if, perchance, they should be needed, perform patriotic service for their country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the other House provided in this bill:

Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty.

At the present time there are 18 reserve officers of higher rank with the reserves, all but two of whom would have been eliminated if the House provision were allowed to remain in the bill. There are 14 with the reserves scattered around the country and four here in the department. Those in the department are the liaison officers between the regular service and the reserves. The tendency of the regular officers is somewhat to disregard the reserves, and perhaps to put things over on them to a certain extent. These officers in the department watch the interests of the reserves, and unless they were men of fairly high rank and experience they would not have much standing in protecting the interests of the reserves.

As to the 14 who are stationed in various sections of the country with the reserves, these are men who are thoroughly familiar with the naval-reserve matters and have charge of the reserves in their respective districts. They are men who have studied the situation in each district, who have watched it, who understand it, and who work with the men in the reserve. To turn these men out would simply mean that the efficiency of the reserves would be shattered. I have had many letters since this matter came up, but I have never heard it questioned by anyone who is interested in the reserves in any way that the House provision would work to the detriment of the reserves.

The Senator from Wisconsin reads us a letter from a man who does not sign his name, and who is evidently some disgruntled officer who does not like the way things are proceeding. I can not imagine anything that could do more harm to the reserve than to restore the House provision.

Along with that comes the question that was brought up by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], which has to do with the question of summer cruises. In the bill we have provided $650,000 to arrange for summer cruises for the reserves. For the purposes of economy the House cut that item out. In the Army appropriation bill there have been put back the items for citizens' military training camps and for reserve officers' training camps, but now the reserve is picked out and an effort is made to give up what is the most essential training of the reserve, which makes them the fine body of trained men that they are, and it is proposed to do it in order to save $650,000.

Naturally all the reserve associations over the country are very much stirred up about it, and none more so than the reserves around the Great Lakes, who insist that they shall be given an opportunity to take their summer cruise. They do not have an ideal summer cruise on the Lakes, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said. They do not have the best ships, but they use old gunboats, five in number, which are operated, I think, at a cost of about $100,000 a year. Those ships have been put in condition, and, while they are not the most modern ships, the men get excellent training on them. Some of the companies in that district are as good as if not better than any others we have, and it is due to the training they get on these summer cruises and to the weekend drills which they have.

The Senate has already acted on both of these matters and its action will help the reserves. I hope very much that its action will not be overset and that the summer cruise under officers of higher rank will be continued as provided in the bill as reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not think the able Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has fully answered the statements made by the Senator from Wisconsin. I think he has offered no adequate explanation for the retention of so many officers of high rank, with these enormous salaries, whose activities are limited to just a few months during the year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, they are on duty all the time. They get paid only when they are on duty.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator deny that some of them are receiving from five to seven thousand dollars a year?

Mr. HALE. They receive the regular pay of active officers of the Navy when they are on active duty, which it is quite right that they should receive.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator deny that they are paid for the entire year?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not; but I say they are on active duty during that time.

Mr. KING. Active duty on the Great Lakes, when for six or seven months there is no training whatever, and there is nothing for them to do?

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes, Mr. President; there is training all the time, every week.

Mr. KING. Training whom?

Mr. HALE. The reserves are being trained all the time. There is a weekly drill and instruction schools.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator is in earnest in asserting that during all of the year the boats upon the Great Lakes are receiving and training reserves.

Mr. HALE. They do not train altogether on boats, Mr. President. They do it in their halls and armories, wherever the drill is conducted.

Mr. KING. Oh! The Senator, then, is providing a land force instead of a naval force?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I repeat that I do not think the Senator has sufficiently answered the statements made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. I can assure the Senator that the reserves all over the country are greatly interested in this matter. They feel that they have been very badly treated by the provision in the House bill, and they are very much discouraged. If we can do anything to encourage them, I sincerely hope we will do so.

The committee went into this matter very thoroughly, and they were unanimous in approving the action that has been recommended.

Mr. KING. There is no objection whatever, as I understand, to providing a Naval Reserve. There is no objection to providing that the Naval Reserve shall have 15 days of active service. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, however, and with the statements made by the officer whose testimony he read, that the training upon the Great Lakes, in view of modern warfare and the post-Jutland developments, would scarcely qualify them for service upon our battleships or submarines or destroyers, because none of those great warcraft are found upon the Great Lakes.

Take a man who has been upon one of those old tubs—and I have seen two of them—up on the Great Lakes, and place him upon a battleship or a submarine or a destroyer out upon the Atlantic or the Pacific or the Gulf, and he would be as much of a stranger to it as some of us would be upon the planet Mars. He would be wholly incompetent to deal with the activities that are required upon those modern naval war vessels.

I think the Government should make a sufficient appropriation to enable those who live in the interior, and who desire to affiliate with the Naval Reserves, to be transported to the Atlantic coast or to the Pacific coast or the Gulf, where there are modern war vessels, and where they may receive the training that will enable them to render efficient service in the event of a naval conflict between the United States and some other country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Naval Reserves about whom the Senator is speaking are very anxious to have their training cruises kept up, and they are anxious to have their training done exactly where it is done now.

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; I suppose they are.

Mr. HALE. If they did not get proper and efficient training out of it, they would not be asking so earnestly to have it continued.

Mr. KING. A man living in Chicago, of course, would like to train and drill right there on the Great Lakes within a stone's throw of his home; but that is not the place where he is going to learn the arts of war and equip himself for fine naval service in the event of a conflict between the United States and other countries.

Mr. HALE. Attention has already been called to the fact that one of the companies trained in that district stood second on the list of companies all over the country, and there are 139 of them.

Mr. KING. I should like to know just how much rating such a man would have for firing torpedoes and for going down in submarines and for manipulating the guns and other mechanism of a submarine. I should like to know how much rating he would have for handling the mechanism and doing naval service upon a destroyer or upon a battleship. Obviously, he would get no rating, because he would have rendered no service. He would be wholly unacquainted with such duties. A battleship would be as much of a stranger to him as it would be to landlubbers who had never seen the ocean.

Mr. HALE. Oh, I think not. I think the training he would get with guns, boats, machinery, and everything of that kind would be most valuable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, line 4, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "reserve" down to the period in line 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. HALE. I call for a division. The question is on the committee amendment, as I understand, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, this is a proposition involving several hundred thousand dollars. I think we ought to have a yea-and-nay vote on it; and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dale	King	Sheppard
Austin	Davis	La Follette	Shipstead
Bankhead	Fletcher	Logan	Shortridge
Barbour	Frazier	McGill	Smoot
Blaine	George	McNary	Steiwer
Bratton	Glass	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Glenn	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Goldsborough	Neely	Townsend
Bulkley	Gore	Norbeck	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Norris	Tydings
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Vandenberg
Carey	Hawes	Oddie	Wagner
Cohen	Hebert	Patterson	Walcott
Connally	Howell	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Jones	Reed	Watson
Costigan	Kean	Robinson, Ark.	White
Couzens	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Cutting	Keyes	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the committee amendment, upon which the Senator from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may the question be stated, so that Members who were absent will know what they are voting upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, line 4, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "reserve" down to the period in line 11.

Mr. BLAINE. If the amendment is rejected, as I take it from the committee's report, it means a saving of over $600,000.

Mr. HALE. Oh, Mr. President, I can not accept the statement of the Senator. We are voting on the amendment on page 13. The total pay of these officers amounts to $24,000, and no more.

Mr. BLAINE. I accept the correction made by the Senator from Maine. I had in mind the two amendments.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but we are voting now on this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand. This amendment has reference to the pay of the United States Naval Reserve officers who serve only six weeks annually; and yet their pay for that short service, together with their land service, whatever that may possibly be, amounts to about $5,500 to $7,000 a year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered on this question. Of course, that is not the proposition at all. The proposition is that there shall be only two reserve officers with rank of over lieutenant in the Navy or captain in the marines assigned to the reserve. That will mean that 18 officers who are now with the reserves, who are familiar with the work, who are building up the reserves and taking care of them, will be put out of office, and the whole reserve organization will be destroyed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator states the proposition in another way, of course. This bill will eliminate those Naval Reserve officers who, as I pointed out during the debate, sail only about six weeks a year——

Mr. KING. On the Great Lakes.

Mr. BLAINE. On the Great Lakes and other places, and who then may serve in some armory for the balance of the year, where they have practically no service whatever, no duties to perform of any substantial character; and those officers receive from $5,500 to $7,000, which includes their allowances, I am informed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, these men are on active duty and performing duties in connection with the reserves right through the year, and unless they are allowed to do it there will be no one to look after the reserves.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, these reserve officers are all over the country; and they administer to the reserves in the same way that the professors do down at Annapolis. They all have weekly drills. The officers have night schools, and give out the problems these men are to study and to learn, so as to equip them for service in the United States Navy. That is a very valuable service to the United States Navy, and should not be curtailed or diminished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROOKHART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I have been unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and vote "yea."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). Upon this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Were I permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who is necessarily absent, but I am assured that the Senator from Connecticut, if present, would vote as I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING].

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COPELAND. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—40

Austin	Dale	Kendrick	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Keyes	Steiwer
Bratton	Fletcher	McNary	Thomas, Idaho

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I now renew my motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 12, line 15, was adopted, where the Senate committee increased the appropriation over the House provision by $650,000. It covers the item for a summer cruise of the Naval Reserve. I have already discussed the question, pointing out that this would put no one out of employment, but would simply dispense with an appropriation of $650,000 for a service which is not essential. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, is this vote on the motion to reconsider?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated, so that I may consent to the reconsideration asked for by the Senator, and we can take the matter up on its merits.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order for the yeas and nays is vacated.

Mr. HALE. I hope we can come to a vote on this question, as it has been already discussed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 12, line 15, was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, line 15, the committee proposes to strike out "$3,077,686" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,727,686," so as to read:

Pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $3,727,686.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to supplement what the Senator from Maine has said in just a few words.

This is an item which involves the very lifeblood of the Naval Reserve, which is the unit bearing the same relationship to the Navy the National Guard bears to the Army.

This is the item which involves the cruising facilities in the central part of the country, around which the reserve inevitably has to be built.

It has been said that the equipment is inadequate and insufficient, and that undoubtedly is true. The more the credit to the Naval Reserve of the central part of the country, which has an efficiency record which compares favorably with that upon either coast.

Mr. President, so far as economy itself is concerned, I remind the Senate that this item already is $780,000 smaller than it was last year. It already has taken its share of the economy burden, and there is neither reason nor rational mathematics in now proposing further economy, which deliberately would kill the Naval Reserve in the central part of the country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not think anybody who knows my record would accuse me of failing to believe in and support adequate national defense, but I can not vote to reduce the salaries of Government employees to the extent we have, and vote to permit such activities as these in the Army and the Navy to go on during this present year of depression.

It seems to me, as a defender of and a believer in national defense, if there is any one way to begin to save money, it is by curtailing from the Army and the Navy every single unnecessary activity during this one year. No harm could come to the Navy from cutting this item out. How can we justify discharging Government employees and cutting down Government salaries, and yet allow such activities, important as they may be under normal conditions, to go on in the Army and the Navy?

We ought to have a moratorium on every such activity and all maneuvers in the Army and the Navy for one year. That would not mean that we would impair the personnel; it would not mean that we would discharge a single man or reduce the wages of the enlisted men. But how can we justify appropriating for the naval reserves' training cruises, in view of conditions, if we believe what we say?

That these cruises are useful and necessary in ordinary years we all concede. But this year we have the situation of some of us voting to deprive the ex-soldiers, many of them in distress, of the money they think is due under their adjusted-service certificates, because the Public Treasury will not stand the drain upon it, and yet we are to permit the Army and the Navy to indulge in various military activities just as if we were getting ready for war, when every human being knows there is no war in sight and no danger or threat of war.

I have voted at every single opportunity to reduce the appropriations in the civil departments and I can not act differently on the Army and Navy bills, and I repeat, no Senator can fairly question my unalterable allegiance to a strong national defense. Mr. President, I assert again this year is the year of all years to cut out such activities as this, to have a moratorium of expenses and activities in the Army and the Navy. I can not see how Senators can face the men and women in the Government service who will lose their positions because of the reductions we have made, and those whose salaries will be reduced, and yet allow these special activities to go on in the Army and Navy during the coming year of depression.

For these reasons I propose to vote for the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I was going to suggest to the Senator that we might well spend some of this money to feed some of the boys who have come to Washington in an effort to collect what they feel is due them on their World War adjusted-service certificates and are camped over on the Anacostia flats in a mud hole.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Who have already fought a war for their country and now are living in sanitary conditions which are a disgrace to any civilized community.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am getting out of patience with talk about economy and attempts at economy while we allow the Army and Navy to proceed with the same activities they would follow if we were on the verge of war in this year of distress and trouble. Let us apply the same rule of economy to every department and bureau of the Government during this depression, at least. I can not understand how we can justify any other course.

I voted for a 10 per cent cut in the Army appropriation bill. I understand the Senator from Utah will make a motion for a similar cut in this bill. I shall vote for it. It seems to me it is, in this emergency, our paramount duty to begin with the Army and Navy and cut out every possible activity that can be dispensed with. If I thought for one moment it would impair or destroy or weaken the strength of the defense of our Government, I would not vote for it, but I can see no harm, in this year of distress, of destitution, of difficulty, of demand for reduction in the expenditures of the country, in feeling that we must cut salaries and discharge employees, but oh, the Army and the Navy must be spared! I can not follow that reasoning. It is not pleasant to vote for these reduction motions, but consistency and duty requires it.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, it is always disagreeable to me to differ with the philosophy of my friend from Massachusetts. That is not for the Army and Navy. This is for the finest body of young men in all America who are giving their time and their energy to prepare for real service to their Government in time of war. In my section of the country we are particularly interested in the reserve program. On the sea coast men are trained in the Coast Guard and in other branches of the Government, but this great training camp has men from Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Kentucky, many of whom served in the World War. All up along the river and on the Great Lakes the cities and the States have contributed to the support of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. President, it is out in the Central West that we are getting our fine sailors. If these young men want to learn how to shoot, and want to learn how to serve their country, at least we should be decent about it and treat them properly.

I have followed and voted for all the cuts, but this is a thing that is serious. It affects the social life, the future naval life of our country, and the assault is upon the reserves in the Central West, upon the Great Lakes, and in the Mississippi Valley.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Not knowing how he would vote on this amendment, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is necessarily absent. In his absence I refrain from voting.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Again referring to my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and transferring it to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], I vote "yea."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). I make the same announcement with respect to my general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I find that I can transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I do, and vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 26, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, during the consideration of the economy bill in the Senate an amendment was offered and accepted which afforded what might have been a relief from unfair pay in relation to the employees in the navy yards, who are situated a little differently in the matter of wages than are other departments. To insure that fair play the Senate accepted the amendment. There seems now to be some little possibility that there would be a compromise which might leave the economy bill hanging in the balance for quite some time. Because that is the case, I am going to offer the amendment which was adopted in the economy bill and ask the Senator from Maine, in charge of the pending appropriation bill, to accept it for resort to in conference in the event it is required by reason of such action as might be taken by the conferees on the economy bill. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 55, line 15, after the word "plants," insert the following:

Provided further, That hereafter the schedule of wages of employees whose wages are adjustable to conform to the prevailing rate paid for similar classes of work in private employment shall not be less than the present established rate of pay for any employee or for any trade or occupation as of the date when such rate was established in any Government establishment, nor shall the average pay be less for any trade or occupation in any Government establishment than it was upon the date when the present wage schedule became effective, nor shall the pay be indirectly reduced by the assignment of work to lower-paid employees.

Mr. NYE. The adoption of this amendment would in no way and in no wise preclude the employees thus affected from any pay cut that might finally be agreed upon by the conferees in the consideration of the economy bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, my purpose in offering the amendment to the economy bill was to prevent the navy yard employees, whose wages are adjusted by the wage boards, from getting a double cut. Under the law, every year the wage boards are supposed to meet and adjust wages. The wage boards have not met this year, but I presume they will do so in the near future. The economy bill also provided for a cut in wages, and for that reason the cut under the economy bill and this cut from the wage board would cause these men to be reduced twice in the course of a year. Therefore I offered the amendment to prevent the double cut, and it was adopted.

If the economy bill does not go through there will be no cut in their wages by legislation, and the only cut that will come to them will be the ordinary cut that may come from action of the wage boards. That might be a cut, or it might be a raise in wages. I see no reason why they should not be subject to that provision.

Mr. NYE. The acceptance of the amendment which I have offered would maintain the average pay in employment in the navy yards. Certainly the Senator from Maine would have no objection to accomplishing that, would he?

Mr. HALE. But this is a very complicated amendment. It is not at all like the amendment which I offered on the economy bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to make this suggestion to the Senator from Maine, if the Senator from North Dakota will indulge me. The conference report on the economy bill will no doubt be acted upon while the navy appropriation bill is still in conference. May I not appeal to the Senator from Maine to take the amendment to conference in order that if there is certain action in the economy bill which would make this amendment desirable, he will be in a position to give it consideration, which would not be the case were he to make the point of order, which I frankly admit would lie against the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Of course, a point of order would lie against the amendment. However, I am perfectly willing to take the amendment to conference, but I can not hold out very much hope that it will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 36, line 18, after the numerals "$1,600,000," it is proposed to add a semicolon and to insert the following:

Provided, That from said sum the naval station at Key West, Fla., shall be maintained upon an active operative status.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, should that amendment be adopted, it would not call for an additional appropriation, but it would provide for a particular station being considered in the expenditure of the general appropriation provided on page 36 of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this expenditure was not estimated for by the Budget Bureau.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know that it was estimated for. In the figures submitted to the House of Representatives in February, I think, there was mention of eliminating an item of about $18,000 on account of the discontinuance of this station and transferring it from an active to an inactive status.

This is the only naval activity in the United States as to which there is an effort practically to close it down completely. The amendment, as I have said, does not call for any additional expenditure. I think by the apportionment and distribution of the large sum of money which is appropriated for maintaining such stations the department could keep this station on an active operating status. It would not cost, even according to their own statement, anything additional in the way of an appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is not the case of closing a station down under any provision of this bill. This station has been already put on an inactive basis several months ago. What the Senator from Florida wants to do is to have it revived. It could not, however, be revived without additional appropriations being expended in some way on it. There is no Budget recommendation for the expenditure, and I therefore make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think if the department had a right to issue an order, which was done, as I recall, about the first of May, and which I consider a very unfair procedure, to put this station on an inactive status, certainly it would have a right to issue an order apportioning a part of the funds appropriated in this bill for the use of that station so as to put it back on an active operative status.

There is no question of any great expenditure. It was only claimed that the saving by putting this station on an inactive basis would be about $18,000; and I can not help but be impressed with the inconsistent attitude, when there has been no other naval activity which it has been attempted to put absolutely upon an inactive status anywhere else in the whole country. This is a station which is well located, and it has been in use by the Government for many years. Now absolutely to cut it off does not seem to be right.

I have been instrumental in assisting in saving a great deal more money to the Government on automobile expenditures than this whole item will amount to. We have cut off an expenditure, which the department did not ask to have cut off, of about three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars on automobiles for Assistant Secretaries, heads of bureaus in the Navy. So, I repeat, I have been pretty active and instrumental in saving a great deal more than the $18,000 which would be involved in this amendment. However, the inconsistency of the Navy Department is that they came in and asked for their automobiles, for their luxuries, but now they want to cut off a small amount of $18,000 necessary for this station.

Mr. FLETCHER rose.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to remind the Senate that the station at Key West has been in existence for over half a century. It is located at a very strategic and important point in this country, at a point which is adjacent to the Caribbean Sea, the Panama Canal, and what is really the Mediterranean of the western world, the Gulf of Mexico. The station has been there for all these years. It is now said the Government can save $18,000, and it is recommended that this station be made inactive, thereby throwing men out of employment. I do not know how many men are employed there, but they probably number 40 or 50, who will be thrown out of employment. It is stated that it is for the purpose of reducing expenditures to the extent of $18,000.

This station at Key West has been needed for all these years; it is needed now just as badly as it ever was needed. I think it would be a great mistake to do away with it arbitrarily, in order to effect $18,000 of that amount, and it is very doubtful if by taking such action there would be saved to the Government a cent. There is a question whether they would save anything by the time those there were transferred and their expenses paid.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think my colleague and I together have pretty thoroughly explained the situation. I understand the chairman of the committee made a point of order against the amendment. Of course, we should like very much to have it considered if it is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Maine make a point of order?

Mr. HALE. I made a point of order; yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator insist upon it?

Mr. HALE. I insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KING. If there are not further amendments to be tendered, I desire to submit a motion. I move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions that it be reported back with a reduction of 10 per cent below the aggregate amount now carried in the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to be heard on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

There has been much said during the present session of Congress about economy. Senators have risen and made the welkin ring with protestations of their willingness and their anxiety to make reductions in Federal expenditures. They have denounced the extravagance and waste in the Government service; they have voted for similar motions to the one now pending with regard to every appropriation bill except in the case of the Army appropriation bill. When that measure came up Senators cooled off in their ardor for economy; the Army appropriation bill was sacrosanct; Senators who had been leaders in the talk for economy could not vote for the 10 per cent reduction to be applied to the Army bill, and the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] failed. Now, when the motion is made to apply a 10 per cent reduction to the Navy appropriation bill, the very Senators who made the loud pleas for economy, thus getting their names in the headlines of the newspapers back home with stories about all the money they were willing to save the taxpayers of their States, desire to dispose of the motion by a viva voce vote.

Mr. President, what has been happening to naval expenditures in this country since the war that was to end war? In 1923 the expenditures for the Navy, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, were $322,532,909; in 1924 they were $324,129,998; in 1925 they were $326,365,467; in 1926 they were $311,611,694; in 1927 they were $322,620,723; in 1928 they were $337,608,086; in 1929 they were $364,806,678; in 1930, the first year of the depression, they were $374,052,691; in 1931, the second year of the depression, they were $352,022,986; and the appropriations for 1932 were $358,262,123 plus unexpended balances from previous years; and, despite such economies as may have been effected, it is probable that actual expenditures during the current year are to be about on the 1931 level.

The Budget estimate for 1932 was $342,606,000. The House, partly in view of the available unexpended balances and partly in order to effect actual economies, cut that sum to $326,353,459. Had the Senate committee applied the same rule to this bill that has been applied to all other appropriation bills, save that of the Army, it would have reported a bill which would have had a total below $300,000,000. Instead of that, however, it recommended a bill carrying $318,218,461. This is, of course, exclusive of the possibility of supplemental estimates which may be submitted when Congress meets next December. It is still approximately at the 1923–1927 level of expenditures for naval purposes, despite the sharp decline in commodity prices that has taken place in the last two and a half years. If the carry-over of the unexpended construction balance be added, amounting to $27,000,000, according to Representative AYRES, the expenditures during this coming year may actually total, roughly, $345,000,000.

Mr. President, this bill provides for carrying on naval construction at the same rate of expenditure which would have occurred in normal years. In 1923 we expended for construction $46,632,000; in 1924 we expended $41,697,000; in 1925 we expended $34,022,000; in 1926, $25,250,000; in 1927, $27,430,000; in 1928, $36,935,000; in 1929, $46,760,000; in 1930, the first year of the depression, we expended for naval construction $49,872,000; in 1931, the second year of the depression, we expended $37,944,000 for naval construction. The expenditures for the current year were estimated by the President in his Budget message last December at $53,000,000, the highest in all the years since 1923. During the House committee hearings in February, Secretary Adams submitted an estimate of $58,375,000 for construction, in this third year of the most cataclysmic and devastating economic crisis which this country has ever experienced.

Mr. President, whatever the precise total may prove to be at the end of this month, the Senate should face the fact that if the committee's recommendation shall be followed, and if the motion of the Senator from Utah shall not be agreed to, the expenditures for naval construction in 1933 will be little, if at all, less than those for the current year.

The totals in the bill do not tell the story. In past years amounts substantially larger than the Navy was ready to spend were appropriated and the unexpended balances have been carried over from year to year.

The Budget for 1933 carried estimates of but $31,400,000 for the construction of new vessels, a decrease apparently of $7,150,000 over the $38,500,000 appropriated for the fiscal year 1932.

The President's Budget message pointed out, however, that this seeming decrease in reality meant no decrease at all in expenditures for construction; that if full advantage were taken of the available funds there would actually be an increase in the expenditures for construction. He said:

> When the cash balances to be carried forward from prior years and the amount to be made available by transfer from the naval supply account fund are taken into consideration the total that will be available for ship construction in 1933 is estimated at $57,000,000.

This sum, he added—

> exceeds in amount the expenditures for ship construction in any one of the last 10 years. * * * The amount available for 1933—

Continuing to quote from the Budget message—> will provide for normal progress in construction of every vessel now authorized by law and permitted under treaty restrictions except six destroyers, the laying down of which has been postponed, and, in addition, for beginning construction of one more 8-inch-gun cruiser in January, 1933, which is the earliest date permitted under the terms of the London treaty.

If the President erred, he appears to have erred on the side of conservatism when his analysis of these figures is compared with that of Chairman AYRES, of the House subcommittee on the naval bill, who explained to the House on April 19:

> For new ship construction the Budget provides a direct appropriation of $31,400,000, and contemplates the augmentation of such sum by a draft of $6,000,000 upon the naval supply account fund. There will be available, in addition, an estimated unexpended balance at the end of the present fiscal year of $27,000,260, making a total available for expenditure during 1933 of $64,400,260. The committee is advised that probably all of that sum actually will be expended except $4,169,667.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have been quoting from Chairman AYRES. Does the Senator from Maine wish to interrupt me?

Mr. HALE. I simply wanted to call the Senator's attention, if he will pardon the interruption, to the fact that to replace the Navy that we have now, cutting it down to the limitations of the London and Washington treaties and not rounding it out in categories where we are lacking, would cost us substantially $80,000,000 a year, provided the whole Navy were to be replaced within 20 years, which is the maximum life of any ship in the Navy under the terms of the treaty. So that during the past 10 years we have never spent anywhere near what we should have spent simply to replace the Navy. We have not spent half what we should have spent in most years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but that does not alter one iota the point I am making. I am putting in the RECORD the startling fact that total expenditures for the Navy and expenditures for the construction fund have been rising year by year; they are continuing to rise during this period of depression; they are rising at a time when broadax economies have been applied by Senators who are riding the economy wave to all of the civil services of the Government that are rendered daily to the citizens of this Republic. But now, as in the case of the Army bill, when the Senators who have bellowed about economy are confronted with a proposal to treat the Navy with the same rule which they applied to all others they balk, they gag, they find some excuse. The Senator from Maine says that we did not spend half enough in previous years.

Mr. HALE. Or in this year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, if the Senator from Maine had his way, he would have an appropriation in this bill for the $900,000,000 authorization bill that he passed a while ago. The Senator from Maine thinks every dollar wasted that does not go to the Navy.

Mr. President, referring again to the statement I quoted from Chairman AYRES of the House subcommittee. He had been advised that in spite of the President's insistence upon economy, and in spite of the belief that substantial economies might be effected, the Navy intended to go ahead with construction expenditures of approximately $60,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

Senators who voted to cut the low-income groups of Government employees, those who voted to cut men and women getting less than a thousand dollars a year by 10 per cent, now refuse to apply a like cut to the construction of ships which everybody knows will neither be completed nor needed during the next fiscal year.

The same Appropriations Committee that has treated the Army and the Navy with such tender mercy in its drive for economy has recommended, in the independent offices appropriation bill, the hamstringing of the Federal Trade Commission because the committee said it could not afford to appropriate $300,000 to carry on the activities of that commission in investigating the Power Trust and in investigating the Cement Trust and in carrying on the other investigations which have been ordered by the Senate.

The same committee cut into the appropriation for the purpose of carrying on the valuation of the railroads $2,000,000. The House had provided $2,750,000, and the Senate committee which has treated this appropriation bill with such tenderness in so far as economies are concerned slashed into that service and by indirection repealed the law for the valuation of the railroads by reducing the appropriation to the sum of $750,000.

This slash is made at the very time when valuation of railroads should be going forward and kept up to date, in view of the largess which the Government is extending to the railroads of this country through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in view of the further fact that if this depression continues the Government will be inevitably confronted with the problem of taking over the railroads and operating them during this crisis just as it did during the war.

Mr. President, in order to achieve an apparent reduction in the pending bill, and in view of the assurance that the money would not be used anyway because of the availability of balances coming over from previous years, Chairman AYRES stated that the committee had subtracted from the Budget estimates the unneeded $4,169,667, which left in the bill a new appropriation for "Increase of the Navy" amounting to $27,230,333. I ask the Senators who have led the charge for Government economy, are you justified in providing in this bill $27,230,000, according to Chairman AYRES, of the House Committee on Appropriations, for increase in the Navy in this the third year of this depression?

Seemingly, this constituted total "economies" of more than $11,000,000 over the preceding year. Actually it permitted a building program in excess of that in any one of the 10 preceding years. Not a single ship is to be delayed in construction. In fact, as the chairman of the House committee pointed out—

> Every vessel for which authority exists to build or commence the construction of during the fiscal year 1933 is provided for in varying degrees in the Budget and bill, save seven destroyers, one transport, and an experimental submarine, all authorized in 1916.

In other words, in spite of the alleged need of imposing sharp reductions upon virtually every other governmental activity, it is proposed to go full steam ahead with the entire naval building program, except for a few vessels under the obsolete construction program authorized in 1916.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HALE. How many vessels does the Senator think we are laying down this year?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know how many vessels are to be laid down this year, but I take it that Chairman AYRES is a reliable authority, and he states that—

> Every vessel for which authority exists to build or commence the construction of during the fiscal year 1933 is provided for in varying degrees in the Budget and bill, save seven destroyers, one transport, and an experimental submarine, all authorized in 1916.

Take that statement, Mr. President, coupled with the statement he made, which I quoted from a moment ago, that this virtually amounts to a $27,000,000 increase in the construction program, and I submit that the Senator can not evade the point that the Senate is not only increasing the total appropriation but it is increasing the construction fund as well. This year the construction fund will be the largest of any in the last 10 years.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator has given so many figures that I can not quite follow him. There is no question of building the seven destroyers and the experimental submarine. Congress appropriated for the building of 11 destroyers, but only 5 of them have been contracted for. The other six have not been contracted for, and there is no plan to build them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Chairman AYRES did not state that they were provided for in this bill. He said with the exception of those——

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator to say that they were provided for.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that there is no new construction provided for at all except one 8-inch-gun cruiser which, under the terms of the London treaty, we are allowed to complete before the close of the year 1936, and the old ships that we have been building for years, that have not been completed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; but you propose to go right ahead with construction as though this were a normal year. The bill proposes to proceed with the modernization of these battleships, as if it were a normal year, at a time when the Senators who ballyhoo for economy claim money can not be found in the Treasury of the United States to carry on important civil activities of the Government. The "economy bloc" of Senators could not find money to carry on the valuation of railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They could not find money for the Federal Trade Commission. They are unable to provide money for maternity and infancy protection. They say we must abandon rehabilitation and vocational training of the handicapped. They are ready to cut off activities to protect the public interest. The economy-shouting Senators say there is no money for these purposes; but these same Senators are perfectly willing to find money to provide for the biggest construction program in the last 10 years in the present bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The same committee that has added to this naval construction bill struck out about $2,000,000, involving the laying off of 700 trained men, for the sake of saving money in evaluating the railroads.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly—I mentioned that while the Senator happened to be out of the Chamber—and at a time, as I said, when there is more need to carry on that service, in order to protect the Government against the eventualities which may confront it during the present crisis, than ever before, perhaps, in the history of the valuation activities.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the Senator's attention also to what I understand to be a fact, that the cut in the Interstate Commerce Commission appropriation will cut off $360,000,000 which is owing to the Government by the railroads under section 15 (a) of the interstate commerce act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the recapture clause.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in addition to the eight 8-inch cruisers already built and the seven now under way, the London treaty still permits the building of three more vessels of this type, one each in the calendar years 1933, 1934, and 1935. One of these cruisers can therefore be begun some time next January. Disregarding entirely the condition of the Federal Treasury and the Budget submitted by the President, the appropriation bill as passed by the House, and as now recommended by the Senate committee, carries $800,000 to proceed forthwith next winter with the building of this additional cruiser.

Senators will have to take their choice on this vote as to whether they would rather spend $800,000 on an 8-inch-gun cruiser, the usefulness of which has been questioned by Navy experts and which will not be ready for a number of years, or whether they would rather have the investigations conducted by the Federal Trade Commission and its other statutory activities proceed. On this vote Senators must decide whether they favor the largest construction fund for naval vessels in recent years or whether they believe we should maintain activities of the Government which mean the protection of the public interest and the improvement of human values.

The bill as now before the Senate has a further decrease of $9,167,333 in the appropriation for increase of the Navy. Apparently this represents a step toward true economy. The fact remains, nevertheless, that construction expenditures of the Navy will still be greater than in all but one of the years since 1922. On top of that, as I said a moment ago, the bill carries $14,000,000 for the modernization of the battleships New Mexico, Mississippi, and Idaho, in addition to the unexpended balance from the appropriation of $10,000,000 previously enacted for this purpose.

Mr. President, Senators vote to cut the low-income groups of the Government employees 10 per cent—those who live below the level of barest necessity. Senators vote to cut off the regulatory activities of the Federal Government which they do not approve of. By indirection Senators seek to repeal in the guise of economy the Government regulation of big business. Senators vote to hamstring the Federal Trade Commission. They vote to cripple the Interstate Commerce Commission, all in the name of "economy," but those same Senators will vote, in this third year of depression, to modernize these old and obsolete battleships, which every man here knows will not be needed under any circumstances in the year 1933, and for that purpose they will appropriate out of the Treasury, which they have been contending is in such a deplorable condition, $14,000,000, in addition to an unexpended balance of a $10,000,000 previous appropriation.

Senators may make that appropriation if they want to; they will have to go home and defend it before their constituents, but I say to you that the voters will see the falsity of the plea which has been made for economy by those Senators. They will see that Senators have used this plea for economy to smash down the wage standards in the Government service. The constituents of Senators will see that they have used this hue and cry for economy for the purpose of indirectly securing the repeal of regulatory activities of the Government, which could not have been accomplished if bills were presented for that purpose. The voters will not forget that those same Senators refused to apply the rule of 10 per cent reduction to the appropriations for the Army and the Navy.

There is a little paper published out in Galena, Kans. I happened to see a clipping from it the other day, from which I read:

Let's pretend, as Alice in Wonderland might, that instead of building one of the new 10,000-ton cruisers Uncle Sam should present the cost, about $17,000,000, to agencies interested in public health. Here is what they could do:

Guarantee cancer-research work for one century. "One cruiser for cancer would insure the banishment of the plague," asserts Dr. Ellice McDonald, of the Cancer Research Laboratories; or Give 680,000 people complete medical attention for one year; or

Make possible a thorough physical examination to some 3,000,000 individuals, or allow them each one day in a hospital; or

Supply a quart of milk every day for one month to each one of the 6,000,000 improperly nourished children in the United States.

Senators who voted against relief for the hungry and destitute at the beginning of the session, Senators who oppose food for the hungry bonus army, Senators who cut the pay of Government employees, Senators who cut and slashed every appropriation bill for the civil arm of the Government service, Senators who have been the leaders in the drive for so-called economy will now vote to appropriate money with a lavish hand for the Navy. They were strong for the 10 per cent reduction rule on all bills except the Army and Navy, for which we will expend this year nearly $800,000,000.

Mr. President, all the talk on this floor, all the pages of the RECORD filled with cant about economy and balancing the Budget are a sham and a hypocrisy if Senators vote against this motion to recommit the naval appropriation bill for a 10 per cent reduction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROOKHART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], and vote "nay."

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], and vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is absent from the city. Therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I understand that my pair, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Again referring to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. NEELY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If that Senator were present he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Again announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. Not knowing how he would vote on this motion, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays, 27, as follows:

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill with instructions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under agreement that bill went over a day, and the motion therefore would not be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator can ask unanimous consent to take up the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to which I have just referred in order that it may be made the unfinished business, and that we may vote on it if possible to-morrow or, in any event and in all events, that it may come up for discussion to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7726) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that immediately upon the disposition of the so-called bonus bill the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 8888, a bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such a program.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

FEDERAL HOME-LOAN BANKS—ADDITIONAL REPORT

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2959) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 837) thereon.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. WAGNER each submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ISSUANCE OF ARMY RATIONS TO UNEMPLOYED VETERANS

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) providing for issuance of Army rations to unemployed World War veterans.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

MRS. FLORENCE KELLEY

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD a memorial address delivered by Miss Lillian D. Wald, one of the most distinguished American women, upon the renowned humanitarian, Mrs. Florence Kelley, at a memorial meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Washington, D. C., on May 20, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has been enriched since its birth by the personality, the vital qualities of Florence Kelley. For us here any formality expressive of appreciation, admiration, and reverence for that gallant, generous, and unique friend must be inadequate and is perhaps unnecessary. For nothing that we can say or that can be written could give a picture of what her presence in any group meant, what an extraordinary and, I may say, unparalleled stimulation she was, unless, indeed, you had the good fortune to have felt her power; and who that ever was in her presence that did not feel her quality and did not respond to the stimulus that she gave; who did not leave the meeting without the hope of remembering what she said and how she said it.

We do know, however, that for our own sakes we can not come together after her death without recording something of our appraisal of Florence Kelley, that record may be made in the history of this organization of her part in its development and in its achievements. From the first challenge of William English Walling in the summer of 1908 to reawaken the spirit of the abolitionists, Mrs. Kelley belonged here, and ever since you received from her a share of her great nature, unseparated by consciousness of race or creed; and this was of the very essence of Florence Kelley. Those of you who have sat with her will understand me when I say that she never did anything for the society, for the colored people, that was alien to her sense of fellowship. She did things with you, with sensitive adults who felt the responsibility for each other and must act with each other, in which the question of race distinctions should have no weight. Identity of fortunes, good and bad, likenesses and not differences were to be stressed. Your problems were her concern to the same degree that they were your concern. Through the long and precious quarter of a century that Mrs. Kelley was a member of our household at the Henry Street settlement, and the numerous times when she returned to the group after a meeting of this organization I can not recall that there was a single comment or an interpretation from her of the obligation of her race to your race. Always and always the note that she sounded was of our meeting, our people, our problems. Justice and fair dealing was the trumpet call. How personal was that relationship you know. Not many know how easily the little children who went up with their working mother to spend the summer in her beloved Naskeag home slipped into that New England atmosphere, because Mrs. Kelley made no difference, and the Maine native who labored on her land therefore saw no difference.

It is therefore without emphasis on this characteristic that we are memorializing her to-night, but as a great and unique woman who lived with us, worked with us, and who will never die as long as the things that she stood for and proclaimed as the essentials of civilization live within our social consciousness. Mrs. Kelley wanted to live forever, not from any lust of life or even for such personal endearments with which she was enriched, though she loved people and loved her work, but because there was so much to be done, and the need of doing was to her the challenge to act and to get others to understand. A troubled, tempestuous, vivid life she led, rich in great experiences, and tender, too, because of her capacity for tenderness and her love and her loyalties. I suppose she realized the deepest desire that can come to any one—she did the work that was worth living for and that will not be lost by her death.

But unbelievable as was her capacity for hard, unremitting work, she cherished certain cultures of life—not easement or luxuries but respect for the written word. She made demands for clarity and simple English, a forceful lesson to those for whom she felt the obligation to help, at times the obligation to severely criticize. Legends will grow about her, built upon her quick penetration into the essence of a problem, and stories will be told by proud folk, grown men and women of course, whom she spared not the rod because she cared. For no child that I ever have heard of was severity deemed necessary. The last time I saw my beloved friend in life was in her hospital room, and though her mind was keen on public impersonal interests, she was mindful of the precious personal, the weekly excursions, and she had me read Emily Dickinson's poems (some one had sent the volumes), and she had me pause in the reading that she might enjoy a winged word or a cadence.

I presume that very few people will question that Florence Kelley's pioneering work for the protection of children has affected the morals of America and morals far beyond our shores. Slow action and disappointments at times seemed to her a betrayal, and a betrayal of the things upon which our American civilization is based. But, looking back from those early days when she made her study of the sweatshop conditions in Chicago—among the first, if not the very first to fix attention upon the immorality, the social crime of the neglect of the children in this rich country of ours—we have marched on. We have been reminded by Mrs. Kelley that we must march upon the feet of the little children, and never did she lose an opportunity to proclaim the rights of children and the wrongs that were perpetrated upon them and the generations to come by neglect of them. Of course, Mrs. Kelley spoke for all children, not only for the children that she discovered in the sweatshops of Chicago, but for the children the world over. There were no frontiers in her social consciousness. Children of all races were related to each other. With that vision the world became her parish, and wrongs to the children in China or India became her affair and were closely related, if not an integral part, of the fortunes of the children in Chicago and New York, or children in the canneries outside the city boundaries, whose liberation in New York State was largely due to her.

With this society, Mrs. Kelley, overburdened, unremittingly active, found time to help build its foundations, and replaced whenever possible other interests, already well-established, that she might throw herself into its programs, rarely omitting a meeting, participating whenever possible in its conferences. One of your members related the other evening an experience in a southern city, when at the last hour it was found that there was no place on the program in that city for a discussion of the negroes' needs by negroes, and so this section removed to a place of its own and Mrs. Kelley and Grace Abbott went with it, not making comment, but both as a matter of course marching into the negro church for the meeting.

In some ways Mrs. Kelley was intolerant. She was intolerant of superficiality, intolerant of selfishness, intolerant of inaction where action was called for, and very sharp could be that tongue. Our reminiscences are enriched by the recitals of the quick, rapier thrusts that she made. I recall one instance when some one defended a woman who had disappointed those who had expected much of her. People who still counted upon her support, said, "Well, she has an open mind." Said Mrs. Kelley, "That's what I object to. Her mind is open top and bottom." Though capable of tenderness and tolerance, tenderness and tolerance were not given at the cost of straightforward, upright truth and justice. She often appeared before the legislatures to present her case, a ready crusader for just causes, and she knew her facts, which were strengthened by her driving power and her rich and lovely voice; and what a pity that no record was made of that voice, only those who heard it will never forget! Coming away from a crowded hearing in Albany, which was in the interest of the children who were working in the canneries, and where the arguments of the opposition seemed very thin indeed when contrasted with the passionate defenders of the rights of children, this bit of conversation was overheard. "Well, you know this bill is all wrong. Why don't you say something!" (This to a canner:) "What, and let that fire eater in the black dress make a monkey of me!"

At the memorial meeting that was held in New York immediately after her death, the evidence of the range of her interests, her activities, her constructive force was almost unbelievable. For its program came John Howland Lathrop, broad-minded Unitarian clergyman, friend, and, I think he would like me to say, humble disciple of the woman to whom the tribute was made; Newton Baker, broad-minded in his almost limitless field; Dr. Alice Hamilton, social crusader, too, and the only woman member of the staff of the Harvard Medical School; eloquent Doctor DuBois from this organization; and Harry Laidler, who represented Mrs. Kelley's political convictions. For Mrs. Kelley was a socialist long before there were any of her acquaintances willing to affiliate with the tiny group of rebels in the dingy little meeting places in New York.

There was a time when she was not welcomed, and with humor and no bitterness she told me, as one night we watched from the window the poor little parade that in those days gave expression to the few who revolted, "I belong there, but I was put out, and as nearly as I can understand it, I think I was put out because I could speak English." She lived to see the gallant leadership of the society and rejoiced in that. Frances Perkins, commissioner of labor, at the memorial meeting proudly proclaimed her indebtedness to the beloved leader and joined with the others in communion with the great spirit that had given them strength, as each one testified in that Quaker meeting house specifically to the awakening that had come through her.

But no memorial to Mrs. Kelley would be complete without reference to the other colleagues with whom her great works were developed: Paul Kellogg, editor of the Survey, and Jane Addams and the famous women of Hull House, among them Julia Lathrop and Grace Abbott; Professor Commons and later, among the intimate, Josephine and Pauline Goldmark, who were as daughters of her heart; Justice Brandeis and George Alger, her associate in child-labor legislation and committee work; and the long list of other men and women who worked with her and tried to realize her vision, who learned the lessons of hard work and zeal for a cause.

But little could be told of her vast influence at that meeting, as to-night but little can be told by me of the many measures that were translated into definite programs because of the light that she shed. Mr. Baker said that in all the times that he had met with her, when he was president of the National Consumers League, he never left her presence without feeling that his own flagging spirit and energies had touched an elemental force and were reinspired and that he had tried to preach her gospel.

The constructive legislative measures traced directly to Mrs. Kelley, her literary work, her participation in suffrage for women, her international and pacifist measures, her immediate enlistment in spreading intelligence in the cause and the need of the Federal Children's Bureau, whose twentieth anniversary we are commemorating now—a list too long to enumerate—these found their roots in her respect for the individuality of the man or the woman, the little boy or the little girl. She asked for them protection from exploitation, leisure to have a share in the fun and the recreation of life, and she was not afraid. She was not afraid of truth, she was not afraid of life, she was not afraid of death, she was not afraid of enemies. If she was afraid of anything, it was her fear of indifference, her fear that people would cease to care, would retire into smugness and satisfaction when there was so much more to be done, and what had been done she insisted was at best only an opening up of the way to a richer life for all.

At the twenty-fifth anniversary of her service to the Consumers League, friends came in great numbers to pay their tributes. It was memoriable because of the sincerity, the gratitude evidenced, the quality of appreciation. It was said and it was sung. I think people will remember that night for long years. The speakers had said their say and the time for Mrs. Kelley's acknowledgment had come. Upright and with ringing voice, barely commenting on the praise, but forthright she reminded us how little had been accomplished, how much was to be done. We had broken a path, perhaps, but there were mountains to be climbed, great roads to be opened up. No rest for her or for us—keep on!

In concluding I would like to summarize her extraordinary qualities, and I am baffled. But this I would say; that she has an undying place in the rise of the civilization of America and what she gave can not be lost. She is woven into the pattern of our social consciousness. We can not forget her, but we must think of her, speak of her, and pass on to those who were not illuminated by her radiance the lessons that she has taught. You remember in the Bluebird the old couple who sat in their heaven, "Not dead," said they, "as long as we are remembered."

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 7 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 17, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1932

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We draw near to Thee, our Father, in humble confidence and with the courage of true love. As these are inspired by Thee, be pleased to accept our thanksgiving and praise. As we look back, how often have we been confused by the dark and the inscrutable things which surged about us; now we know that they were ways of mercy; gracious Lord, we thank Thee. Clothe us with just and righteous judgment and make known Thy counsel to us for our obedience and guidance. Come with us; walk with us upon the sea, in the twilight and on the shore. Wherever there is need, give the divine supply. Bless our homes that they may be as the gates of heaven. Unto Thy holy name be eternal praises. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 76 to the bill (H. R. 7912) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes."

That the Senate recedes from its amendments Nos. 13, 16, 17, 21, 22, 29, 53, 61, 67, 68, and 69 to said bill.

That the Senate further insists on its amendments Nos. 14, 15, 30, 56, and 82 to said bill.

That the Senate further insists on its amendment No. 77 to said bill, asks a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MCNARY, Mr. JONES, Mr. KEYES, Mr. KENDRICK, and Mr. HAYDEN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1523. An act for the relief of certain tribes or bands of Indians in the States of Washington, Idaho, and Montana; and

S. 2340. An act to provide funds for cooperation with the school board of Shannon County, S. Dak., in the construction of a consolidated high-school building to be available to both white and Indian children.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands, I ask unanimous consent to recommit the bill (H. R. 11895) to authorize the President, in his discretion, to make certain adjustments in the eastern boundary line of Rocky Mountain National Park in the vicinity of Estes Park, Colo., and for other purposes, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, was the bill reported out to the House?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes. It was reported by the committee to the House. The author of the bill desires to change the bill or drop it entirely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Anything that goes back to the Committee on the Public Lands is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENDING RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that it is necessary for me to leave the Capitol to-day and go to Denver and relocate my wife, who has been an invalid for many years. I regret it exceedingly also on this further account: At the present time there are pending some measures of very great importance. Permit me to say to the House that up to the present we have spent most of our time in this entire session in attempting to modify or palliate our present conditions. I am very hopeful, and I trust that hope may be shared by my colleagues, that we may now, during the last part of the session, get down to doing the things that are absolutely necessary to take us out of our present condition.

Among the important matters pending there are three, in my judgment, that we ought not by any means to overlook. We ought not consider adjourning until these three measures are provided for. The first one is that we shall supply an abundance of direct relief to prevent starvation in this country.

The second is that we ought to provide a far-flung program of public improvements, in order to give labor to no less than 1,000,000 men.

Third, we ought to pass the farm bill now put forward by the farm organizations. In my judgment, I do not believe we ought to consider adjournment until at least these three measures have been passed by this body and the other body and have become law.

I want to pair to the best advantage I can in favor of all these bills. In closing permit me to suggest that I am hopeful that our conference committee on the economy measure may leave in the vocational-training provision as the House passed it, because the House voted practically unanimously in favor of that, and I trust the House will not recede from that position.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you, and I shall return as soon as possible.

TRANSOCEANIC MERCHANT AIRSHIP SERVICE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 8681) to develop American air transport services overseas, to encourage the construction in the United States by American capital of American airships for use in foreign commerce, and to make certain provisions of the maritime law applicable to foreign commerce by airship.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. This bill will be contested, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 96]

Abernethy	Crisp	Hull, Morton D.	Parks
Aldrich	Crowe	Hull, William E.	Patman
Allgood	Crump	Igoe	Patterson
Arnold	Davis	Johnson, Ill.	Peavey
Bachmann	De Priest	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pratt, Harcourt J.
Beck	Dominick	Johnson, Wash.	Pratt, Ruth
Beedy	Doughton	Kahn	Reid, Ill.
Bland	Douglas, Ariz.	Kemp	Rogers, N. H.
Bloom	Doutrich	Kennedy	Sanders, N. Y.
Boland	Drane	Kunz	Snell
Boylan	Estep	Lambeth	Stalker
Brand, Ga.	Fernandez	Lamneck	Stokes
Brand, Ohio	Finley	Lankford, Va.	Stull
Browning	Flannagan	Lea	Sullivan, Pa.
Buchanan	Foss	Leavitt	Swanson
Buckbee	Freeman	Lehlbach	Taylor, Tenn.
Bulwinkle	Garber	Lewis	Tierney
Busby	Gasque	McMillan	Tilson
Byrns	Gibson	McReynolds	Treadway
Cannon	Gillen	Manlove	Tucker
Cavicchia	Goodwin	Mitchell	Warren
Chase	Hancock, N. C.	Milligan	Watson
Christgau	Hare	Murphy	Whittington
Clark, N. C.	Hastings	Nolan	Williams, Tex.
Clarke, N. Y.	Hawley	Norton, N. J.	Wood, Ind.
Cooper, Tenn.	Horr	Owen	Yon
Corning	Houston	Palmisano

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and twenty-three Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8681.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, quite an interest has developed in this measure. There is some opposition. There were only 30 minutes on a side provided under the rule. More time than this is demanded by men who seriously want to discuss this question, and, therefore, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that time for general debate be extended 30 minutes with a division of the latter 30 minutes the same as for the original hour.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the cotton and the wheat bill will come up right after this bill. It is a pressing need. I am in favor of the gentleman's bill. An opportunity will be given Members to speak under the 5-minute rule, and we already know the gist of the bill. I hope the gentleman will not press his request.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I, too, want to supplement what the gentleman from New York has stated with reference to the wheat and cotton bill, which, to my mind, is of paramount importance. Time is growing short. We may be forestalled from getting a final vote on any conference between the House and the Senate in case they disagree.

I hope the gentleman will not insist in asking for more time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us find out if there is any opposition to the cotton and wheat bill which is coming up this afternoon.

Mr. CELLER. That is next.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is next on the list.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to me? I understand the Rules Committee has reported a rule for the consideration of an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act whereby the Department of Agriculture will be permitted to make loans to farmers for planting crops this summer and fall which may be harvested as late as 1933. Is it contemplated to bring up this rule for the consideration of the House in the near future? I am deeply interested in this measure and hope it will pass.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; that will come up very soon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8681.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8681, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the further reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield at this time 25 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, and ask unanimous consent that he may use that time himself or yield it, as he sees fit.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], who is to control the remainder of the time, how he desires to use it?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I shall follow the example of the gentleman from Texas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] to use if he wishes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, this bill contains three provisions.

First, it applies the admiralty law to airships flying over the sea just as now that law applies to ships sailing on the sea. This is necessary for a number of reasons, but chiefly in order to determine the rights and liabilities of airships. Otherwise insurance companies will not insure them.

Second, it contains a provision that permits American airships to make contracts with foreign airship companies—for example, the German Zeppelin Co.—for the mutual use of their terminal facilities, their docks, and also permits them to stagger their schedules, so that an equal number of airships that the two companies might own should be going in opposite directions at certain times in the week and thereby give the maximum efficiency in service. This provision is thought necessary by lawyers, because it was felt that any attempt to make a contract like this without specific statutory authority might infringe the antitrust laws.

The third provision of the bill is this: It gives to the American airship companies the right to bid for the carriage of mail in the same manner and according to the same terms as is now provided for surface ships. In short, no airship company could at the present time carry mail without a contract or without permission of the Postmaster General so to do. This simply fixes the same maximum rate for compensating airships as now prevails in regard to surface ships. These are the three provisions of the bill.

My reasons for urging the passage of the measure are several: First, it will do more to enable the people of the United States to extend their foreign trade than any other single thing we could do. We can make the journey to London in 2 days or a little better, as compared with the 6, 7, or 8 days the best ships now take.

Obviously, the nation that has the most expeditious means of transportation and communication will be the most likely to extend its trade faster than any other nation. At the present time the German Zeppelin Co. has completed 4 of 10 scheduled trips from Friedrichshafen to Pernambuco, South America, the scheduled time being 4½ days as compared with 16 days on surface ships.

Does it take any diagram, does it take any great explanation, to see the advantage that that nation must have in the extension of its trade with foreign countries over those nations which do not have that means of transportation? Why, my friends, with this means of transportation available it would be possible to take fully authorized representatives of commercial companies, who could not otherwise take the time, across to Europe in a couple of days, bring them back in a couple of days, and finish the trip in a week, and probably conclude a contract right there and then, where otherwise it might be necessary to carry on negotiations for weeks and months in order to conclude such a contract.

So, my friends, the chief reason for urging the passage of this bill is that it will do more to expedite the extension of our trade—and certainly we need foreign trade at present—it will do more to help us extend our foreign trade than any other one thing we can do to-day.

There is another reason. This, in my opinion, will do much to increase the business of the steamship lines. To show that I am not mistaken about that, the late Captain Dollar was very much interested in the promotion of these transoceanic airship lines. Why? For the simple reason that he felt that if we had some quick means of going over to the Orient, and prominent representatives of commercial houses in the United States could go to the Orient, or any place else, for that matter, for the purpose of getting business it would mean increased cargoes and increased revenues for the steamship lines. It seems to me he was entirely right, and he was perfectly willing to invest his money in such an enterprise.

It is an ideal way for the transportation of passengers. The people of the world have not yet come to realize just how really satisfactory is this method of transporting passengers from one part of the world to the other. Under ordinary circumstances a man is likely to become seasick on a surface vessel, but I am told by those who have had experience and who have been given to seasickness on surface vessels, and who have traveled across the Atlantic Ocean on the Graf Zeppelin, that it is really a very delightful experience. In fact, one who had been a passenger on the Graf Zeppelin told me he had not the slightest feeling of seasickness, and, moreover, that during the whole voyage you could hardly tell you were moving unless you could pick out some ship on the horizon to tell whether or not you were moving. This man also told me that during the whole time of the trip—and there were storms—there was not a time when he could not balance a teaspoon on the edge of his coffee cup in the dining room of the Graf Zeppelin.

Now, my friends, that, it seems to me, points a finger to the future method of rapid transportation.

But there is another reason. You can make the trip across the oceans with this type of transportation more safely than you can on surface ships. Why? For the simple reason that instead of going head on into a storm, which the fixed channel requires a surface ship to do, airships may take their charts, which are prepared for them every few hours of the day, and take advantage of these storms and these winds in order to expedite their passage across the ocean, as was done by Doctor Eckener when he came back from Japan to California in three and a half days. He simply availed himself, by scientific means, of the help of the storms.

But there is another reason, my friends. We have talked a great deal during this Congress and we have voted for some rather unusual measures to abolish unemployment. Now, my friends, the Goodyear Zeppelin Co., at Akron, Ohio, now employs, roughly speaking, 1,000 of the most highly skilled and technical men in the United States. They not only have a corps of very efficient engineers, who have been gathered together after a most painstaking and careful search, but they have highly trained, technical workmen who work under these engineers.

At the end of this year the second ship for the Navy, namely, the Macon, will have been finished. If we are not to be allowed to go on and manufacture commercial ships, this thousand of the best skilled help in the United States will be walking the streets with the already existing millions of unemployed looking for some means of earning a livelihood. So when these folks tell us they want to encourage new enterprises, here is an enterprise already started and this enterprise only asks for the privilege of carrying, on fair terms, passengers, express, and mail. They can carry the passengers and express without the consent of anyone, but they must have the consent of the United States Government to carry the mail. Why should they not have that privilege? Why all this balderdash about a subsidy? There is not a contract let to a star-route man, to a railroad, or to a steamship line that does not involve exactly the same principle. Is there any particular reason why these people, if they build their own ships and risk their own money, should not be allowed to come in on at least equal and fair terms with everybody else and say, "We will carry your first-class mail for you"? I can see none whatsoever.

My friends, there was a statement made in the minority report that to me seems only astounding. It is stated there that the cost of one of these airships is about three and a half million dollars. This will probably be so after they have reached a production basis; but in addition to that you have docks, which cost as much, if not more, so that if you are only using one Zeppelin from here to the Orient the total investment would be about $6,000,000, as I recall it.

They undertake to make the House believe that the total cost of operations, which is between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000, would be borne by the mail. The Postmaster General must find that any contract he makes is in the public interest; but if we charge 25 cents a letter on that long trip from California to the Orient, three times as far as across the Atlantic, the average income would almost be the total amount that it costs to operate the ship for a year. This would not be fair, because passenger and express revenue should pay their just share of the cost of operation. It would not, therefore, be fair under the circumstances to charge even that much for the mail; but if it were necessary, I think anybody would be more than glad to pay 25 cents extra for the special-delivery service he would get in this way. If they did charge this, it would bring about $10,000,000 of revenue, which, it seems to me, would be far more than ample to pay any expense assumed in hiring the space in the dirigible.

The Goodyear Zeppelin Co., which is the chief bidder in this country, although there is another concern under contemplation at Detroit, has already invested three and a half million dollars in terminal docks and other facilities for building ships at Akron. The city of Akron has spent $2,000,000 for an air field to encourage the lighter-than-air industry. The Guggenheim Foundation has spent $350,000 in a laboratory to experiment with lighter-than-air craft, and has brought the leading lighter-than-air engineer all the way from a technical school in California to Akron to work there. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the argument advanced to-day, as well as when the rule was presented for consideration by the principal sponsor of this legislation, and all that I can glean from his argument is that we should vote a subsidy to this private enterprise that wishes to take the initiative in establishing a passenger dirigible line between New York and England.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] cites the case of Germany having established a line from Germany to Pernambuco. I am informed by the Foreign Mail Service of the Post Office Department that this is a most irregular service. Also that France maintains a service from some point in Africa, namely, Dakar, over to Argentina, which is likewise not a very regular service, requiring seven days from Paris to Buenos Aires.

It is sought to extend the provisions of the White Act to this service of dirigibles across the ocean. What is the basis for our voting a subsidy or a subvention to the steamers plying between here and Europe and other foreign ports? It is to provide an auxiliary for the Navy in case of need. Get clearly in mind that these vessels that receive this subsidy are obligated to carry the entire mail that may be offered to them.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. About 4 pounds a trip, and they get about $1,000,000 for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. For the fastest steamers they receive $12 a nautical mile for every mile traveled, but they are obligated to carry the entire amount of foreign mail that may be offered.

Now, what is proposed by the bill under consideration? The argument is that we wish to have fast transportation of transoceanic mail. In competition with whom? Not in competition with any existing like service, because there is none such. The American public has the advantage of the fastest line of steamers, whether flying the American flag or a foreign flag, and our Post Office Department utilizes the Bremen and the Europa under the German flag, and other ships flying the flags of other countries, and with only one idea in mind, the quickness of dispatch of the mail between here and foreign ports and vice versa.

The bill under consideration purposes to give $12 a nautical mile, as is provided as the maximum amount in the White subsidy bill, for a dirigible which, as he says, is capable of going across the ocean and returning in one week. The distance is 3,000 miles, or a round trip of 6,000 miles, and if they make a round trip once a week that one ship would entail an obligation upon the Government of $3,744,000 during the year.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a fact which he has perhaps overlooked. The maximum amount that may be paid is $35 a nautical mile.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is $35 a nautical mile, then it is three times the $12 basis which I used, or we would pay for one ship going across and back on an average of once a week, instead of $3,744,000 a year to support this private industry that needs work out here in Akron, three times that amount, or nearly $11,000,000.

Mr. PARSONS. The $35 is for a round trip.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I am in error in my figures.

Thirty-five dollars for a round trip would make $5,000,000 for one ship for the year.

Mr. KELLER. For how long?

Mr. STAFFORD. Going back and forward once a week. We would pay for a ship out of the Treasury of the United States $5,000,000 unnecessarily, because the mail is now being carried and privileged to be carried in fast-moving ships which are not costing the Government one cent more than we are paying under the subsidy, and this is trying to take additional money out of the Treasury.

But that is only one objection. We have had some examples of the way the Post Office Department has been spending money in paying for transportation of foreign mail. We have a foreign mail air service from Miami going down the west coast twice a week and going down the east coast to Brazil once a week, that costs the Government $7,000,000, and the revenue is only one-fifth of that amount.

Oh, the argument is, we are increasing foreign trade. How ridiculous. There is no legitimate demand from American merchants trying to have a faster service.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the protagonist for high tariffs.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin trying to leave the impression with the House that the Postmaster General would sign a contract for carrying this mail that would cost the Federal Government $5,000,000 a week?

Mr. STAFFORD. Five million yearly for a round trip weekly service by one dirigible. I am stating what we might have imposed on us under this authorization. He has signed contracts for the transportation of mail from Miami to South American countries, a needless expense of $7,000,000 annually, and the revenue is only one-fifth of that sum. That is not justified, because there is no competition existing in the foreign service. I am opposed to this policy of authorizing the Postmaster General, whether he be Republican or Democrat, to have the right to stick his hand into the pockets of the people of the United States for a preferred service, even though the proposal for the preferred service emanates from the State of Ohio.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is not it a fact that the air mail subsidy amounts to about $35,000,000 annually above the revenue?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no justification for having such a service established.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. How does the gentleman from Wisconsin distinguish between the air mail subsidy and the mail subvention?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the mail subventions provide an auxiliary in having vessels available as an addition to the Navy in time of war. That is the theory of Great Britain, that the fast-going subsidized steamers will be of value in time of war. It is the opinion of some members of the War Department subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and of some members of the Committee on Military Affairs, these large balloons are vulnerable, notwithstanding the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio that they are filled with helium and are invulnerable.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am one of the three members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who signed the minority report. I want to state briefly to the House my reasons for objecting to this bill, especially at this time.

Of course, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] names the bill "A measure to promote international trade and travel throughout the air," but, in my judgment, the proper name for the bill, as presented to the House and in the hearings, would be "A bill to promote and enlarge the deficit in our Post Office Department."

I have here a statement, prepared by the Post Office Department, showing the expenditures, revenue, and deficit of our postal funds for the past fiscal year.

Total expenditures		$803,893,287.80
Total revenues		657,348,088.08
Deficit		146,545,199.72
Revenue credits:
Penalty matter, other than that of Post Office Department, including registration	$9,886,456.00
Franked matter—
By Members of Congress	723,671.00
By others	128,970.00
Second-class matter, free in county	704,579.00
Free matter for the blind	132,161.00
Publications exempt from zone rates	392,495.64
	11,968,332.64
Expense credits:
Aircraft service	[1] 17,167,501.04
Differential favoring vessels of American registry	[1] 18,911,474.60
	[1] 36,078,975.64
Total revenue and expense credits		48,047,308.28
Net deficit		98,497,891.44

(It will be noted that subsidies for air and ocean vessels mail service equaled about one-third the net deficit.)

The total postal expenditures were over $803,000,000 and the total revenues of the Post Office $657,000,000, leaving a total deficit for the Post Office Department for the past year of $146,545,199. The loss in subsidies paid the aircraft service above the receipts and the differential favoring the vessels of American registry amounts were as follows: For the aircraft service $17,167,501, and for the differential favoring American vessels under this present bill, $18,911,000, or a total deficit of $36,078,975.64. If this bill becomes a law, the deficit, because of mail subsidies to private corporations, will be much greater in the future as a result of its provisions.

In the first place, gentlemen, it was made very plain to the committee that the proponents of this bill, the Goodyear Co., would not undertake the construction of these ships or enter into the foreign service without this subsidy contract from the Post Office Department. Mr. Hunsaker, the man who has the construction of these ships in charge, so stated, and Mr. Keating, the lawyer who represented the airship people, made practically the same statement. The bill, it will be noted, provides a period of three years before the Government will be required to begin to pay the subsidy under a contract. That provision is not for the benefit of the Federal Government, but it gives the airship people three years to construct their ship after they have secured a satisfactory contract from the Government, otherwise they will not undertake the construction of the ships. It is contended by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CROSSER, and others, that this subsidy contract is comparable to those given ocean-going ships. But the capital invested in airships is much less than in first-class ocean steamships, and the subsidy to airships possible under this bill is very much greater than that to ocean liners of the first class. This was brought out in the hearings before the committee.

[1] Subsidies paid for fast mail service.

Mr. Hunsaker, of the Goodyear Co., stated that under the present law, referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], $12 a nautical mile is the maximum that can be paid to ocean-going ships. Class 1 ocean ships must show a speed of at least 24 knots an hour in ordinary weather to entitle them to a subsidy of $12 per mile. But this bill proposes to go much further than that, as Mr. HUDDLESTON has pointed out, and provides that airships in class 1, under the terms of this bill, can be paid up to $35 a mile, or $350,000 for a 10,000-mile trip to and from the Orient. This is three times the subsidy the Leviathan is paid for carrying ocean-going mail, and the Leviathan cost five or six times as much as one of these airships to construct it. Let us figure $5,000,000 for the construction of one of these first-class airships. There are nine ocean-going ships that are fast enough, we were told, to qualify for class 1; and the United States has only one, and that is the Leviathan, a ship costing a sum that would build five class 1 airships. Yet it is proposed to pay this airship three times as much subsidy as we pay the ocean-going ships; and the question is raised, Does the Goodyear Co. demand $35 per mile as a subsidy? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] brought that out. Mr. Hunsaker testified at page 40. He first admits that they are not bound to carry any kind of mail or any given amount. He states that if they carry but 1 pound they expect to be paid the full subsidy of $35 per mile. He also states that ocean ships now receiving the full subsidy sometimes carry only one letter per trip, and that there are some freight steamers he believes that are receiving subsidies for transportation of the mail. Mr. MAPES asked:

> Would you want the department to make a contract to pay $35 a mile for the carriage of mail?
> Mr. HUNSAKER. Regardless of the poundage?
>
> Mr. MAPES. Regardless of the poundage; whether there is one letter or any number.
> Mr. HUNSAKER. Yes, sir; these are mileage contracts, and it means that the department has leased or owned the capacity; and they can use it fully or not, depending on how they route their mail and on what mail is available.

In other words, all they have to do is to carry one letter in order to receive this enormous subsidy. The airship company can not lose. The contract is ironclad and for 10 years in time. As Mr. CROSSER has already stated to you, the Goodyear Co. has built the Akron, and they are soon to finish the Macon. The Government has paid for the Akron and owns it, and they are going to pay for the Macon and own it. In my opinion, they are of very little public value; they are only naval toys, so far as war service is concerned. For commercial uses they doubtless have great prospects for the future. The United States Government will own the Akron and the Macon, but this bill proposes a subsidy that in a short period of time will pay for the ships contemplated, and a private company will own them, together with a fat subsidy contract that may easily cost the United States a hundred million of dollars in the 10-year life of the contract.

My friend Mr. STAFFORD perhaps got a little mixed in his figures, but the graft possible in this bill is so great that it is difficult for anyone to understand it. Mr. Hunsaker said that every time an airship would make a trip from New York to Paris and return, the $35 per mile subsidy would earn $63,000 each way or $126,000 for the round trip. If they made 50 trips a year they would earn $6,300,000, or more than the highest estimate of the total cost of the airship. Mr. Keating, who represented the company, also stated that on a round trip to the Orient, which is 12,000 miles, at the rate of $35 a mile, a class 1 airship would earn $420,000 for every trip it makes under such a contract. In other words, it is plain that so far as the gross investment in these ships is concerned, it will be paid for by the Government in subsidies in a year or at least in less than two years.

I am not in favor of paying this tremendous subsidy above that which we now pay the ocean-going ships. I do not think we are warranted in paying that additional amount of money. Perhaps the proponents of this bill value these ships so highly because they may be able to fly high enough to get over the tariff wall that has been built between this country and other nations. Because of trade and tariff barriers our ocean-going vessels now have hardly enough business remaining to warrant their efforts to keep the American flag still flying upon the high seas of the world.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They can not get over this tariff wall, I do not care how many airships you have.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I maintain that this bill makes possible too great a drain upon the Public Treasury. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment providing that instead of paying $35 a mile we pay $12 or $15, something comparable with that which we pay the great ocean-going vessels now, ships that have five times the amount invested in them and render a great deal more valuable service to the country.

We had testimony before the committee showing that these airships can earn a great deal of money in passenger traffic. Mr. Hunsaker pointed out that they would have capacity for 80 passengers. If they only take 50 passengers, at $500 per passenger, that is $25,000 per crossing, and every time they make a round trip they can earn $50,000 in passenger fares. Mr. Hunsaker says they expect to make an initial charge of $1,000 a passenger and they expected to get it for a while at least. The Graf Zeppelin charged $2,000 a passenger, and they had a long waiting list of people who wanted to ride on that ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, there has been more juggling of figures here to-day than I have ever seen in this House. As a matter of fact, the postage rates will be so adjusted as to cover the contingencies mentioned, and I believe this is one bill that will give the Government a chance to make some money. I am satisfied that the real result in the end will be a profit to the Government on this service.

There has been a great deal of talk about these airships being toys. Well, you know there were gentlemen in their day who said that railroad trains were toys, and then those who said that automobiles were toys, and not long ago they said that airplanes were toys. Believe me, those Zeppelins that came over and bombed London during the war were not toys, or if toys they were pretty dangerous ones, as they killed hundreds of people. As a matter of fact, I think crossing the ocean on a lighter-than-air ship of the type of the Akron is safer than crossing it on a surface ship. I have taken a trip on the Akron, and so have other Members of this House. It rides more comfortably and I think it is actually safer than an ocean-going boat. On the trip to the Pacific coast the Akron was not in any difficulty from the storms at any time. They did have to go over high mountains, which they would not have to do in crossing the ocean.

Because of the altitude, they automatically released some helium. Most of it was valved out, however, in an effort to descend rapidly when three inexperienced soldiers on the ground unfortunately got hauled up by a sudden shift in air currents in the hot valley that sent the Akron several hundred feet off the ground. These men became confused and failed to let go of the ropes in time. With regular docks and landing facilities such accidents would not occur. One of the benefits of this legislation is that new and additional terminal facilities for airships will be built by private capital, providing in itself much needed employment, and, best of all, without any expenditure on the part of the Government, millions of dollars will go into wages for construction work now, when employment is so needed. The fantastic story, incidentally, about the Akron being in difficulty in a storm over Texas on its westward trip and signaling its distress to the ground with flashlights from the airship arose from somebody's imagination and a lack of understanding of the situation. At no time was the Akron in distress, nor did it send out distress signals. Air-commerce regulations require airships to use intermittent running lights, and it was the periodic flashing of these navigating lights that created the impression on the ground that flashlights were being used to signal from the Akron.

Actually, the crew were most comfortable and safe, and merely as a matter of precaution, Commander Rosendahl decided to cruise around during the night rather than go into the mountain country during the storm at night. There was no hurry and no reason to push on then. Had it been urgent, or in war, there would have been no hesitation in proceeding on its course, even in the storm. It was merely extra precaution with valuable Government property.

The storm, and incidentally one of the most severe that could be encountered, was in no way a barrier to the trip and offered no more hazzard to the airship than a similar storm would to a surface vessel. It was, in fact, an excellent test and proof of the practical value and airworthiness of a big airship.

There is no possible expenditure under this bill for at least three years, so that it is not a question of adding to the present deficit; but it does mean that during those three years when employment is so badly needed, private capital will be brought out of hiding or inactivity and put into normal trade, because it will go into wages. What we need is to get capital into new enterprises. It means that the Goodyear Co. and perhaps others who will build these ships in the meantime, on a chance to bid for a contract, will employ many hundreds of people. Their money will go into circulation. That is the one thing we need to-day.

I have flown to South America and back through Central America, and I want to tell you that air service has materially improved and increased American trade in those countries. It gives us a chance to compete with European countries on the matter of service, both in sales service and the service of equipment on machinery and parts, that the European countries can not give. It has made a material change. The total deficit on air mail can not be charged up as a total loss, because against that is the increase in general American trade that heretofore has gone to other countries, to say nothing of improved international good will.

The next great development is in the air, of course, whether it is in war or in peace. The next great scene of activity is the Orient. The next great trade center to be developed is in the Orient, and that is where speed will be highly essential. It is important for us now to start the development of a type of transportation that will permit us to compete for trade in China with the rest of the world and particularly European countries. It is not the intelligent thing to wait until we are actually in competition with other lighter-than-air ships. The smart thing to do is to take the initiative. That is in keeping with the real American spirit. The thing for us to do is to prepare now for the future and be there first and not get there afterwards, when the trade has already been diverted into other channels.

The Akron, built out of Government funds, is a perfectly practical ship in peace or in war. That is now demonstrated. This bill provides the cheapest possible way for us to aid national defense—to get further development in lighter-than-air ships done privately. Otherwise, we will be forced to do it out of appropriations directly for the War and the Navy Departments. But in this way private capital will make scientific advancement in lighter-than-air ships, which the Navy and Army will profit and benefit by in their future operations.

There are so many benefits as well as possible savings from this plan that it should be undertaken. The answer to the question with reference to the deficit is that if the Budget is not in a condition to stand such contracts, they will not be made at that time, and the rate of postage can always be adjusted to a point to take care of whatever is necessary to spend for carrying the mail on these ships.

The maximum authorized rate per mile based on speed, identical with rates now being paid surface ships, is a protection to the Government, and at the same time places airships in a fair competitive position with surface ships.

The amount the Government, through the Post Office Department, safeguarded by the necessary approval of the Appropriations Committee and the Congress, may see fit to pay for the proposed service can be determined by the Government based on its consideration of: First, what revenue it may likely receive from extra postage; second, its value to the people of the United States in the development of foreign trade, the national defense and the continuance of a new industry seeking to establish itself in these times of depression. The mail-carrying capacity of a transatlantic airship is 20,000 pounds. If all of this capacity were used at a surcharge of 10 cents per letter, the Government would get $80,000 per trip. If only one-half of this capacity were used the return would be $40,000 per trip.

The cost of operating the airship must be recovered by selling its services for carrying passengers, express, and mail. Each service can be expected to pay whatever it is worth. No one can now tell how much these services can be sold for. Only experience in operating can determine this, and this experience can only be gained after private capital has expended many millions of dollars in building airships and terminals. Before setting up this operation, a price for passenger rates must be set up, also a price for express, also a price for mail. If any of these rates are too high or too low they will be adjusted in light of experience. The price the Government may pay will be determined by what the Government may figure its worth to the American people and by that standard only. In this determination the Government will, of course, take a risk with possibilities of gain or loss. The operator will take a greater risk because if the public will not become passengers or send express, the venture will be a failure, and the Government does not pay and the private millions invested in the enterprise will be lost.

If it fails, the Government loses nothing. If it succeeds, it is possible that the Government will make money out of its contract with the operator.

We must realize that we are not and can not longer remain isolated in matters of world trade, travel, and communications. No matter how much we might like to remain so, world progress will not permit it. Therefore it is incumbent upon us to keep pace with developments, and the wise thing is to lead not follow. The seed we sow to-day we will harvest to-morrow. I hope and urge that this bill will pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, every year there goes forth to the country a statement explaining the poor business showing of the Post Office Department and Congress is usually blamed for the deficit. These figures are at times misleading. Again they are the result of juggling the facts, and sometimes the postal policy law, which was enacted some few years ago, is entirely forgotten.

Some years ago we passed an act to separate from the actual postal charges, charges such as subsidies that should not be made against the Post Office Department appropriation. Nevertheless, the Post Office Department is held responsible for these losses, although they were all brought about by an authorization of Congress. This bill will be another charge against the Postal Department. It will increase that deficit, and we, in turn, will be required to increase either the cost for the use of the Postal Service, or we will be required to further decrease the salaries of the personnel in the Post Office Department.

This legislation, like every other measure introduced to promote a new and epoch-making method of transportation, will have its friends and its foes, and from the light of experience and history we know that those who disapproved such legislation in the past were in the course of years humiliated by the results attained.

So, while I will not take a positive position against this bill, because I know that within a few years air transportation of this kind will be as popular as rail or motor transportation is to-day, still I believe we should have in mind that this will be another charge against the Post Office Department and that it properly should be made a charge against the Treasury Department.

Before air mail contracts are entered into under the provisions of this act the Post Office and Post Roads Committees of the House and Senate ought to be given some jurisdiction in the matter. This action, in my judgment, as carried out by the provisions of this bill, will be a usurpation of the authority of those committees.

The making of any air mail contracts for the transportation of United States mails overseas by airship at this time may be a deterrent factor in the uniform and proper development of the American dirigible industry. We should be sure that we neither discriminate nor show favoritism in the matter.

We have similar bills before our committee, and I am, of course, in favor of the general proposition. However, I think it ought to be properly safeguarded before it is adopted and some authority and discretion should be left with Congress. We give the same subsidy and the same privileges to foreign airships that we do to American airships, according to the provisions of this bill. I favor the principle of the bill, but I believe it should be amended. Such contracts as these should require the approval of Congress.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the principle just expressed by my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], chairman of the Post Office Committee, and yet, in line with that principle, I favor this bill and believe it should be enacted into law.

The bill carries out a consistent purpose which is older than our Constitution. It is the use of the Post Office Department to encourage and develop new industries. In 1784 the Continental Congress passed an act granting special rates of payment to stage-coach companies in order to encourage that means of transporting passengers between the villages and towns of the country. The post riders could carry the mails, but Congress subsidized the stage-coach companies for public benefit. Therefore there is nothing new about this proposal. It is simply an old-time program of the Post Office Department in carrying out the policy of encouraging new industries.

I agree with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has said about the cost. He stated clearly facts which should be remembered by every Member of this House. By the act of June 3, 1930, we specifically exempted from the Post Office balance sheet the charges for the air mail and merchant marine subsidies. We took out the cost of the franking and penalty privileges and other services of the kind. Thus, the figure given by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] of $146,000,000 as the postal deficit is misleading. The net deficit was $98,000,000. These other charges are for congressional policies for the encouragement of new means of transportation and other nonpostal activities.

It is said this bill should have been considered by the Post Office Committee, and we have had under consideration dirigible bills for the last four years. Taking the view that this bill provides for an extension of the merchant marine law, it logically comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. As to cost, I believe the bill provides a way to make the service self-supporting after its establishment.

The carriage of 10,000 pounds of first-class mail is provided for under this bill. There is an average of 45 letters to a pound of mail. Under this measure the Postmaster General may establish any rate he desires. It is well within the limits of possibility to say he might fix a surcharge of 20 cents per letter, which would mean a total return of $11.25 a pound. It is possible, therefore, to have a return of $111,000 for a shipment of that poundage of mail. The total maximum cost under this bill will be less than $100,000. So I say there is the possibility this service will become self-supporting after it has proven its value. Certainly we should not hesitate to encourage a brand-new industry, which will set men to work, which will speed up delivery of mail in regard to foreign trade, and which will give us an advantage in speedy transportation over other countries. At the present time France is paying far more in subsidies in proportion to its air mail than is the United States. France not only pays a direct subsidy to aircraft companies carrying mail to her foreign possessions and to foreign countries but she allows the company to keep every penny of the postal revenues received. In this bill the postal revenues received go into the Treasury and are used to help pay the cost.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. What would be the objection to inserting in the bill an amendment which would provide that the expenditure for any arrangement the Post Office Department might make to carry out the provisions of the bill should not be larger than the revenue received.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sure my friend knows that when we start experimenting with this service, there is bound to be a loss for a time. The Pan American Airways Co. has an investment of $18,000,000, which has been used in the foreign air mail service of the United States. It has never paid a penny of dividend and yet it has rendered a great public service. The amount of mail carried shows an increase of 500 per cent over what it was at the start, and the revenues are almost as much greater. The money spent by the Government has been a most profitable investment and nothing we have done has increased to such a degree the friendly relations with our neighbor nations in Central and South America.

At the beginning of this kind of new service there is bound to be a considerable gap between income and outgo, but my belief is that there will be a continual lessening of that gap and in time this service can be made self-supporting.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. I understand, however, that there was testimony presented or representations made that the income would be greater than the cost to the Government.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; I do not believe that would be so at first, because it will take time to prove to our business interests the value of speed and security. However, this measure should be enacted as a forward-looking measure, in line with modern progress. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped, when control of my committee shifted to my side, that I would be relieved thereafter of further performing the function of "his majesty's opposition." But it transpires that the present minority has abdicated their function so far as this bill is concerned, so that it devolves upon me to come back to my previous duty of pointing out why this measure should not be passed.

This is a typical special-interest bill. There is no public demand whatsoever for it. No public authority has asked for its passage or has appeared before the committee. It originated with the Goodyear Co., which conceived the idea that they would be able to get financial support for their merchant-airship development if they could get a profitable Government contract. If this bill is not passed they will build no ship. If this bill is passed—yet the company is unable to get this subsidy from the Post Office De-Department; is unable to get the Postmaster General to enter into the contract that is provided for—there will be no ship built. It will merely be a vain gesture in which we have indulged.

These gentlemen conceived the idea of getting this bill passed through Congress, not as a measure of public importance and not for the purpose of providing against unemployment, but as a means of securing profits for themselves in their industry. Although I have evidence that they have been very active in seeking to elicit support for the bill, I have received only two communications from what you might call outside sources in behalf of it—they were from a couple of fine gentlemen in my district who were interested in a helium development and had been asked to write to me. They want to sell some helium, and, therefore, they are interested in this proposal.

It is a typical special-interest bill. No public interest is to be served or can possibly be served otherwise than in the development of a private industry, if that be a public interest. No responsible officer of the Government has advocated the passage of this bill. It was referred to the Secretary of Commerce. He made no reply. It was referred to the Postmaster General, who, in reply, took occasion to say:

that while we interpose no formal objection to the passage of the measure proposed, I deem it my duty to state clearly that our failure to make such objection must not be construed as committing the Post Office Department now or at any future time to a policy of dispatching the mails across the Atlantic or Pacific by lighter-than-air ships.

We come therefore to the House with hearings carrying only the testimony of those who expect to reap profits out of this proposal, and without any adverse interest having been heard, and without being supported by any responsible officer of the Government.

I am opposed to subsidies of any and all kinds. I trust I may continue to maintain my political fortitude and integrity to the extent that I may vote against all such measures in the future as I have always done in the past. Therefore I am opposed to this measure from the standpoint of principle.

I am merely performing a duty which I feel is imposed upon me in presenting the opposition to this bill. I feel that Members of the House are entitled to know what it means; and let me say to you that I doubt if any who are not on the committee, even after the debate you have heard, fully understand the significance of this bill. Perhaps you will understand but little if any better when I have finished my remarks. Nevertheless, I will at least have the consciousness that I have attempted to tell you something of what this bill means.

The poison in this bill is in subdivision (a) of section 1—the first and main dose of poison. By that provision we legislate with reference to the merchant marine act. You may read this bill yet not have the slightest idea of what it means; you may go even farther and read the merchant marine act and still not get any clear idea of what that provision of the bill means.

Yet that is the heart of the bill. That is what gives the Postmaster General authority to make a contract. There is where the subsidy is carried. Under that provision of the bill the Postmaster General is authorized to make contracts, binding upon the United States Government, for periods of 10 years each, and binding our Government to pay as much at $35 a mile one way upon an indefinite number of lighter-than-air postal contracts that he may choose to enter into establishing routes across the sea. There is no limit upon the number of these routes which may be established. We may have 3 or 4 to Europe; 1 or 2 to Africa; 2 to South America; 3 to the Orient, and so on. There is no limitation whatever upon that. Under that provision the Postmaster General may agree to pay up to $35 a mile for every one of these routes, no matter what its length may be.

It is, say, roughly speaking, about 3,500 miles to Paris. The Postmaster General is given the power under this measure to make a contract binding the Government for a period of 10 years to pay for every trip that one of these vessels may make from here to Paris $122,000. For 50 trips a year you can see that the expenditure upon that one route would amount to over $6,000,000.

If we may conceive that the Postmaster General would enter into contracts establishing routes as I have mentioned, it may possibly transpire that this service will cost the Government up to $100,000,000 a year. And the amazing thing about this is that despite this enormous outlay, it does not follow necessarily that as much as a single letter shall be carried on a single route. Of course, I will not say this will transpire. I merely point out to you what are the possibilities of this bill, and these are the possibilities. The contracts provided for do not require the carriage of any particular amount of mail nor any mail at all. Let me also say now, while I think of it, that every piece of mail sent through the air will be taken away from the mail which would otherwise be carried by our surface ships. I know of no reason to think that there would be any increase in the mail because it is carried in this fashion. And what we are now paying in subsidy to seagoing ships will not be reduced a penny.

Gentlemen take refuge behind the fact that this bill does not award a contract; that it is a mere authorization. In reply, I say this as a matter of principle: That the Congress should not authorize any officer of the Government to enter into a contract which Congress would not itself enter into if it were advised and had sufficient facts before it to enable it to act. The Congress can not shelter itself behind the faults of an officer whom it has clothed with authority to do that which he has done.

The responsibility is upon Congress, and Congress, when it authorizes contracts to be made, should surround them with such safeguards as to make it impossible that it shall be an improvident contract. The Congress should make it impossible that the Government should be beaten and defrauded by a contract, whether in good faith or otherwise.

In authorizing an agent to make a contract the principal is always chargeable not merely with legal but with moral responsibility for the contract which the agent makes within the scope of his employment, and the most that the principal can expect as between him and the agent is that the agent shall exercise his discretion in good faith; but as between outsiders, the responsibility, both legal and moral, extends to the full limit of the authority conferred upon the agent.

If we do not intend that the Postmaster General shall establish these routes, 10 or 20 routes extending to the remotest corners of the world, upon a basis of $35 a mile and at an expenditure of somewhere between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000 a year, without a penny of benefit being derived by the Government—if we do not intend that the Postmaster General shall do this, then we have no right to give him authority to do it.

The argument has been made in behalf of this bill that it merely puts airships upon an equality with the surface-going vessel and enables them to make contracts on the same basis as the surface-going vessel.

This argument, of course, is made in good faith, but it is highly misleading. The joker in it is this: The rate of payment is based upon speed. The speed capacity of the surface-going vessel is about 35 miles an hour, which makes the maximum for a surface-going vessel about $17.50 per nautical mile. But the speed capacity of an airship is about 70 miles per hour, so that the limit of payment at the same rate is $35 per mile, or twice that which could be paid to any surface-going vessel.

The talk about competition is absurd. All you have to do is to put a speed limit in the request for bids and you exclude all the surface-going vessels. In short, you insure, by the passage of this bill, that only one concern in the country can bid on this contract, and that is the Goodyear Co., a concern which has not got a ship and does not need to have a ship until after the contract is awarded. All it has to do is to agree to build a ship within the three years before the contract shall begin.

This is a bill for the benefit of the Goodyear Co. It should be so labeled. It should be so recognized; and those who take the responsibility of voting for it shoulder the responsibility of voting a subsidy of nobody knows how much in amount to this particular concern for the purpose of enabling them to carry on this enterprise. This is what the bill means. This is why I can not vote for it.

When we were in the war everything that was brought in, in the way of a job, was "to help win the war." Everybody who had a selfish interest drew the cloak of patriotism around him and was helping to win the war. That same spirit has passed on to us with the time and the emergency, the same argument has been adapted to the existing conditions, and again that same situation confronts us.

Now it is "unemployment." The idle by millions are walking the streets, hundreds of thousands of starving women and children are reaching out their hands for bread. Now they are capitalizing the humane sentiments which must arise in every heart in the face of such a situation; and we find similar selfish interests pulling the cloak of patriotism around them and saying, "We want to aid the unemployment situation."

If we had an entirely different situation, in which unemployment did not figure, some other highly patriotic reason would be found—"We want to expand our foreign trade," or "We want to nourish the prosperity of the country."

I have never known a selfish interest to come to Congress and put its case squarely on its merits and say, "We want you to pass this measure in order that we may make some money."

The thought crowds upon me that we are now reaping the awful fruit of policies of which this measure is a part. These processes of pseudo-socialism, of which Karl Marx would be ashamed, because they socialize for the benefit of a few instead of the welfare of the multitude. We are suffering from the fruits of such policies now.

Instead of going recklessly forward along this course, which has brought us to the brink of ruin, we should about face and go back to the practice of real individualism so that there might be opportunity for private initiative, free from governmental interference, free from governmental control, and free from governmental subsidies. [Applause.]

If this country is to survive it will be on the initiative of the individual citizen, and his hope to reap the fruits of his labor. It is not by going forward with governmental favors in subsidies or artificial trade barriers, which has brought ruin on the country.

If these people want to make money with airships, let them build them on their own responsibility. If conditions justify airships, we will have airships; we do not need to take this industry and swaddle it with funds from the public Treasury. It is by so doing that we have brought down upon ourselves and on our country the consequences from which we now suffer. Let every man and every business stand on its own feet. Give every man a fighting chance. Take the hand of the Government off business and off enterprise and off the individual. Take the hand of the Government out of the taxpayers' pocket. Let him who would ride pay for the horse. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the efforts of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] should be directed toward the repeal of the merchant marine act and not to an amendment to that act to make it in keeping with the times in which we are living and the only hope that we may have from repairing the mistakes that are being made in the administration of that law. I am willing to concede a great many of the conclusions drawn by the gentleman from Alabama. He states that the grant of air mail contracts will take mail from the surface ships. Of course it will, just as the steamships took mail from the sail ships. Of course it will. At the time of the construction of the first paddle wheel the United States had the greatest merchant marine in the world, built in this country, manned with American crews. With the development of steam and the steamship this country insisted upon the sail ship, so that in one generation we were far behind in a merchant marine. If we delay now and continue to pour millions of dollars into subsidies for surface ships, other countries will have the supremacy in air transportation. The gentleman from Alabama refers to the average speed of surface ships of 35 miles an hour. I do not know whether he said 35 miles or 35 knots. I say that there is not 1 per cent of the ships to which we are paying subsidies that has a speed of 35 miles an hour. Yet I hear no protests from the gentleman from Alabama when the appropriation bill comes before us for the payment of these subsidies. The difference between the subsidy paid to a surface ship under the merchant marine act and the amendment herein provided is that we pay a lot of money to a surface ship for carrying a little mail, while here we will pay a little money for carrying a lot of mail.

I can name line after line, and I have testified to it before the committee, of ships going out on regular trips carrying one pound of mail. I have named the ships; I have named the line; I have not only appeared before the committee upon it, but I laid these facts upon the desk of the President of the United States. What does this do? It simply amends the law to bring airships under the provisions of the merchant marine act. The gentleman says that none of the adversaries appeared before the committee. Of course not, because the bill is open. Any one who can qualify may obtain the benefits of the bill. There is no opposition to the bill. The gentleman says that it will benefit the Goodyear Co. Of course it will. There is no question about that. The Goodyear Co. is the only company in this country to-day that has successfully built a dirigible of the size and qualifications required under the present bill. Let us be frank about it. Of course, they will have the benefit of it, but at least the ship will carry the mail, and the demand for mail on airships will be such that the Post Office will save money. Why? For this reason. I say, and no one can contradict the fact that every week, every day of every week, there are ships leaving the port of New York receiving subsidies from the American Government for mail which they do not carry, but on the same day a foreign ship of higher speed is leaving the port, carrying mail for which we pay by poundage. Unless we keep up with the competition in air transportation we will find ourselves in a very few years in the same situation in which we were when we were compelled to pass the merchant marine act, when it was too late, and it has been badly managed.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not now. The airship is not entirely in an experimental stage. Some gentlemen refer to it as a toy. That is silly. A ship of that size, being able to accomplish what dirigibles have up to date, we can not dismiss as a toy. We have succeeded in completing in this country the finest dirigible in the world, which is the Akron. The greatest authority in the world, and he is in a class by himself, Dr. Hugo Eckener, commander of the Graf Zeppelin, an engineer, says this of the Akron:

> Having just completed a detailed inspection of the U. S. airship Akron at the kind invitation of the commandant of the naval air station, Lakehurst, I am anxious to express to you and your department my sincere congratulations upon the completion of this wonderful ship. A number of fundamental improvements over the conventional design, particularly the inside power plants and the swiveling propellers, besides a number of novel features, represent such a fortunate combination and are of such far-reaching importance that I fully understand the pride and satisfaction which her commander, her officers, and crew take in her. Furthermore, such performance data of the ship as have become known to me, together with the superb workmanship apparent in every detail, are so excellent that I am anxious to convey to you my admiration for this masterpiece of American engineering and draftsmanship.

Mr. Chairman, we pride ourselves in the development of the internal-combustion motors. I suppose every gentleman on the floor believes that we have advanced ahead of every other country in motor development. As a matter of fact, all this good workmanship that Doctor Eckener talks about would be useless were it not for the German motors that are on that ship. I wonder how many of the Members here to-day know that after we had built the Akron, and after we had shown the ability to construct that ship, we did not have the motors to put in it, and we had to go to Germany to get them.

The Akron to-day is equipped with Maybach motors. So that we must learn as we proceed in the development of aviation, and I for one do not want to see my country fall behind as it did with the steamship and as it surely will with the airship unless we do something. If we had not subsidized the merchant-marine surface ships, if we had not adopted that policy, then I submit that some arguments presented by the gentleman from Alabama might be tenable.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not just now. However, in the face of having adopted this policy, in the face of having subsidized surface ships, I say it is simply bringing this bill up to date to amend it, so as to make it possible that an airship may carry mail and receive the same advantages as the surface ships receive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following provisions of the maritime law as now in force are hereby made applicable to foreign commerce by American-built airships registered under the air commerce act of 1926:

(a) Sections 404, 405 (b), 406, 407, and 409 to 413, inclusive, of the merchant marine act, 1928, relating to the ocean mail service; and

(b) Sections 4281 to 4287, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes and section 18 of the act of June 26, 1884 (23 Stat. 57), relating to the limitation of vessel owners' liability; and

(c) Sections 1 to 6, inclusive, of the act of February 13, 1893 (27 Stat. 445), commonly known as the Harter Act; and

(d) Section 15 of the shipping act, 1916, relating to foreign-trade agreements.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 2, line 1, strike out lines 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment would eliminate from the bill the clause which enables the Postmaster General to make a contract for carrying the mails by these airships. It takes away the subsidy which is found in this bill. It removes the poison from this dose that is now tendered.

What I have said in opposition to the bill was addressed to the part which I now seek to remove, and is applicable to my amendment. I have nothing further to add.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Of course, Mr. Chairman, to adopt this amendment would be unjust. I still have not come to the conclusion that the Postmaster General, simply because he is Postmaster General, will be a scoundrel. I think the proper assumption is that he is going to be honest and serve the interests of the American people.

I remember reading one time a quotation from a famous author in which he said:

He that sayeth there is no such thing as an honest man you can be sure is a rogue himself.

I make no personal application of that, of course, but cite it merely as a caution to those who are tempted to assume the "holier-than-thou" attitude.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is there any reason why this or any other means of transportation should not have the same right to carry cargoes, whether passengers, express, or mail, as any other kind of transportation? None whatsoever.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. How much will this bill cost the Government?

Mr. CROSSER. This bill will not necessarily cost the Government a nickel. These ships will be built without a single penny of expense to the Government, whereas the steamship companies can borrow three-fourths of the value of their ships. They do not ask for a single dollar.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it not a fact that any money that is paid to these particular ships for carrying the mail will not be paid to some other ship for doing exactly the same thing, if these ships are built and authorized to carry mail?

Mr. CROSSER. Absolutely so. It seems to me so preposterous. One must have highly developed the love of the heroic rôle when he can picture himself with his back to the wall protecting the American people against a Postmaster General determined to place upon the Post Office Department all of the expense of operating one of these airships and let them carry 80 passengers and a great deal of express scot free. It is so ridiculous that it does not need to be further discussed. If we really believe that this country of ours should avail itself of the opportunity of taking a place in the front rank of the nations of the world in an effort to extend the trade of this country, if we have sense enough to avail ourselves of the advantage of the natural monopoly we have, namely, the helium of the country, located in Texas, Colorado, Kansas, and Utah, we could not give a moment's consideration to this amendment.

These people ask only that they be given an opportunity to bid to carry the mails at a fair rate of compensation. The rates named in the bill are merely the maximum or limit beyond which they can not go. They are the rates fixed by the marine act. As far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to have said the Postmaster General may make a fair contract with these people for the carriage of the mail and let it go at that. We thought we were making doubly sure by putting it on the same basis as the merchant marine act puts the surface ships.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. In the bill, is it intended that the right of the Postmaster General to exercise the power to make a contract shall be permissive or compulsory?

Mr. CROSSER. Altogether permissive. This does not do anything except permit the Postmaster General to make a contract for the carriage of the mail, if he considers it in the public interest. The minority report says that the supporters of the bill would not be interested in its passage if it did not permit the carriage of mail. Neither would it be desirable if it prohibited the carrying of passengers and express. Of course, they must be able to carry all three kinds of traffic in order to make it a success.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gravamen of the argument in favor of this subsidy is that it is for the expedition of the transportation of mail. Following the logic of that position, we should subsidize, or have subsidized, our transoceanic cables and our wireless, because the prime purpose of these utilities is communication.

It is known that under the subvention act we grant subsidies to various classes of steamers based upon their speed, the maximum being $12 a mile. These steamers are obliged to carry all the mail that is offered, regardless of its tonnage, in addition to the mileage subsidy, and for this they get no return. They are paid for the carriage performed.

By this bill you are going to pay this private undertaking, this private establishment, $35 a mile instead of $12 a mile, for it is stated that it is possible under the provisions of the bill to pay $35 a mile, to give employment to a private industry. For what? Not the carriage of the mail. Such an agency is already provided to-day.

The gentleman from Ohio says the law would not be abused by the Postmaster General. I say the Postmaster General has abused the air mail appropriation in establishing foreign-mail service from American ports to South American ports, and has expended millions and millions of dollars when the mail did not justify the expenditure.

This is an authorization without any limitation whatsoever. If the principle involved does not mean anything to the Democrat who is advocating this bill, it does mean something to me, because I do not believe in voting special favors to the special few.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Of course, you all recognize that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama means he might just as well have moved to strike out the enacting clause. It means the absolute discarding of the purposes of the bill.

A great deal has been said about the rate being $35 a mile and about there being no return to the Federal Government. Of course, that is possible, but at least we have got to concede that the Postmaster General is a man of ordinary ability; and, if he is, he certainly is not going to grant a contract at the maximum price and carry the mail for the minimum postage. That can not be. No sane man would ever make a contract of that kind.

Now, you talk about speed, about the use of dirigibles over the water. As the gentleman from New York said, about 15 miles an hour is the economical speed of a steamship. When you go beyond 20 miles an hour the cost of the increased speed is entirely too great to make it economical to build ships faster than about 15 to 20 miles an hour for a long trip.

With aircraft or lighter-than-air craft, the minimum speed will be about 60 miles an hour, and they are able to go up to a hundred miles an hour. In other words, the time of crossing the ocean will be reduced from five days to less than two days.

You all know the difference between freight and express. The steamship companies are not opposing this bill. They know perfectly well that the quicker transportation of mail will increase their freight business, for the reason that business men are in closer contact with their customers abroad.

The opposition talked about four or five lines to Europe and four or five lines to Africa. This is not the last Congress that is ever going to sit. If this law is abused some future Congress can change it. If any company should try to establish more lines than were practical, any honest and efficient Postmaster General would refuse to grant contracts. He would not grant any more contracts than were entirely practical.

I most sincerely hope the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will be voted down, because, as I have said, you might just as well strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Solomon once said, "Where there is no vision the people perish."

We have to go back only a short time to 1907 when the Fulton celebration was being held in New York City. Thousands of people were there from all parts of the United States to witness a trial run of the old Clermont, which had been reproduced for that purpose. Thousands watched the old Clermont as it navigated with difficulty the current of the river. It provoked a great deal of merriment when this pioneer steamship was contrasted with the great, modern, palatial steamers in the harbor, equipped with every possible comfort and luxury from libraries to swimming pools. While the spectators were watching and noting the contrast and commenting on the great improvement and advancement that had been made in a hundred years, some one shouted, "Look" and pointed to the sky. Thousands of people looked and marveled, for there they saw Curtiss flying over the city.

Again drawing upon our imagination and going back to a time not long after the Clermont celebration, we read in great headlines that a ship in distress had sent out an S O S and how numerous ships had received the message and had ordered the pilot to turn back to aid a ship in distress—simply marking the advance that had been made in the field of communication.

One of the most powerful, one of the most logical arguments presented in the United States Senate, with reference to a mechanical invention, was made by Daniel Webster pointing out the impracticability of railroads. He said trains could never hope to attain a speed of more than 20 miles an hour, because if they did the friction would cause the rails to roll up behind the train.

So it is about time to stop and reflect upon the age in which we are living. All of these inventions came in as toys. Many people ridiculed them and characterized them as impractical. Some of these mere toys, such as the telegraph, the radio, the automobile, and the airplane, have literally put hundreds of thousands of men to work at high wages.

One of the needs of the hour is some new invention to take up the slack caused by the invention of machinery which has displaced so many men. The airship is not a toy anymore. It is here to stay. It has already circumnavigated the globe. Companies are running regular airship lines from Germany to other countries.

This is a nation of inventors; it is a nation of people who possess initiative; therefore it seems to me the time has come when we should at least lend encouragement to an enterprise that possesses such great potential possibilities. We subsidized our ships; we subsidized our railroads with public lands, with the result that through this aid and encouragement we brought convenience, prosperity, and happiness to the people as a whole and an abundance of prestige and national wealth as well.

I hope this amendment will be defeated; that we may by our vote encourage this new means of transportation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) For the purposes of section 409 (a) and (b) of the merchant marine act, 1928, as hereinbefore made applicable, there is hereby established the following class for airships employed in mail service in foreign commerce: Class 1, airships capable of carrying 10,000 pounds of mail, with a suitable commercial load, a distance of 2,000 miles without refueling. The compensation for airships of class 1 shall be the same as that provided by section 409 (a) and (b) for vessels of class 1.

(b) Section 15 of the shipping act of 1916, as hereinbefore made applicable, shall be administered by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce shall not approve any agreement which prevents any person a party thereto from making a similar agreement with any other person or persons nor unless it relates to commerce between the United States or possessions or Territories of the United States and foreign countries.

(c) General average and salvage shall be payable with respect to airships of the United States engaged in foreign commerce, their cargoes and freights, in accordance with the maritime law with respect to general average and salvage.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, strike out all of lines 13 to 21, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. (a) For purposes of section 409 (a) and (b) of the merchant marine act, 1928, as hereinbefore made applicable, there are hereby established the following classes for airships employed in mail service in foreign commerce: Class 1, airships capable of carrying 10,000 pounds of mail, with a suitable commercial load, a distance of 2,000 miles without refueling, and capable of maintaining in ordinary weather an air speed of at least 65 knots (74.85 statute miles per hour); and class 2, airships capable of carrying 5,000 pounds of mail, with a suitable commercial load, a distance of 1,000 miles without refueling, and capable of maintaining in ordinary weather an air speed of at least 55 knots (63.33 statute miles per hour). Compensation for airships of class 1 shall be the same as that provided by section 409 (a) and (b) for vessels of class 1. The compensation for airships of class 2 shall be one-half that provided by section 409 (a) and (b) for vessels of class 1."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 15, after the words "class 1," insert: "Provided, That the contracts shall provide that compensation stipulated for shall not exceed such income as the United States shall derive from the mails which may be carried by airships."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made that the Government would lose nothing by these mail contracts.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I am not sure as to the extent of the gentleman's amendment. It seems to me from the reading of it that the limitation of the gentleman's amendment would apply only to the class 2 ships and not to the class 1 ships.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; it applies to all.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's amendment, then, is not a limitation upon the last sentence but upon the paragraph.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes. The statement has been made that the Government will lose nothing by these contracts—in other words, that the mails carried will be sufficient to pay the contract price. The purpose of my amendment is to insure that. It will forbid the payment of anything in excess of what may be derived from the mails carried.

If we purpose to grant a subsidy and if that is our intention, then my amendment should not be adopted. If it is our purpose that this service shall be self-sustaining and derive its expense from the mails which may be carried, then my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Alabama will concede that I for one am willing to call a thing by its right name. I say this is a subsidy. There is no doubt about it, because if it were not a subsidy and they were carrying the mail by poundage we would not need a bill. That is why I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But gentlemen have argued that it was not a subsidy and that it would pay its own way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a subsidy.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. All those who believe that way ought to vote for my amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a subsidy, because, I repeat, if it were not so, and if we paid for the mail carried, they would get a contract under the poundage system and the bill would not be necessary. I prophesy now that after the first trans-Atlantic airship is built, the demands for carrying the mail will be so great that succeeding ships will prefer to carry the mail on a poundage basis.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The purpose of my amendment is to take away the possibility that we may spend all of this money and not have a single letter carried.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not possible, although that is going on right now. I could name ship after ship and line after line getting subsidies for mail and carrying no first-class mail, and our only hope of extricating ourselves from the enormous cost and the demands brought about by the merchant marine act is to adopt this new system of transportation, where we will pay a subsidy and get service in return. If you are against the bill, then, of course, you should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama; but if you are in favor of progress and in favor of giving this new means of transportation the same treatment that is accorded obsolete surface ships, then I say vote down the amendment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman think the ship subsidies we have voted and are now paying have resulted in any benefit to the commerce of this Nation or its trade?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows my position on that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think here is a good place to stop subsidies.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The pending amendment is plausible but very unsound. It proposes to require the airship company to hold at the disposal of the American Government a certain amount of space and let the Government, if it sees fit, either refuse to let them have a cargo of mail or give them an insignificant cargo. In other words, the carrier could not possibly be sure as to having a cargo of mail.

If you were to allow the carrier to deal with the public directly, as it can do in regard to express, of course it could soon come to a conclusion as to what is or is not a fair rate for carrying each letter or each piece of mail.

To ask a private owner to furnish the space, to furnish the expensive equipment, and have no assurance that the Government will furnish a cargo that would pay him the cost of the service he gives in reserving such space, would seem to me absolutely preposterous and unfair, and I, therefore, ask, in all justice, that this amendment be voted down.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. I have sent a similar one to the desk.

For the past six months we have declared and heard in Congress and from our constituents that we balance the Budget. Personally I am of the opinion that this matter has been discussed altogether too long and that action to balance the Budget should have been taken months ago. I believe that all of us are in favor of balancing the Budget and of reduction of the expenses of government.

What are you doing here now? In plain language you are doing exactly what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has said you are doing and what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] admits you are doing, namely, you are voting a substantial subsidy. You are putting another hole in the bottom of the United States Treasury. You are spending taxes of the public in a time of national distress.

It had been represented to me that this proposed law would not call for a subsidy. Personally I am not voting for this subsidy. We must diminish the subsidies already granted instead of creating more debts to pay.

All of us know that airships are past the experimental stage. The only thing permanent in this world is change. Advancement will come without another subsidy being voted from the United States Treasury. I believe it is my highest duty, as well as yours, to see to it that the tax burden of the American people is substantially lowered; when you vote against this amendment, you vote to increase taxes.

This amendment ought to prevail or the bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does not the gentleman realize that any air mail that might be carried on one of these airships will be taken from one of the ocean liners that is now receiving a subsidy, so this would not increase the cost any?

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. And the same subsidy would be paid to the liner that it receives now.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 31, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHALLENBERGER to the committee amendment: On page 3, line 11, after the period, strike out the balance of line 11, and all of lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The compensation for airships of class 1 shall in no case exceed $12 per nautical mile and the compensation for airships of class 2 shall be one-half of that allowed airships of class 1."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to limit the amount of subsidy or pay for carrying the mail by airships to the same amount as that allowed to ocean-going vessels.

As I pointed out in my remarks at the beginning of this debate, the investment in the class 1 ocean-going ship is four or five times the cost of an airship. So it seems to me that in considering the condition of our Federal Treasury, our enormous postal deficit, and the tremendous tax bill just voted to meet the lack of money in the Treasury, we are not warranted at this time in paying a subsidy such as would be possible under the terms of the bill.

It will be noted by a reference to section 409 that I have used the language which provides the pay that shall be allowed to ocean-going vessels. There is a provision in the section following that which provides that under certain circumstances, where the speed of the vessel carrying the mail is greater than 24 knots an hour, additional pay of 50 cents a nautical mile may be allowed by the Postmaster General.

and it was shown throughout the hearings that the airship builders expect that they are to receive this additional compensation, or at least $35 a mile. Under my amendment, Mr. Chairman, airships can be allowed $12 per mile. For a 3,000-mile trip the pay would be $48,000, and for a trip to the Orient it would be $180,000 a trip. With cotton at 5 cents a pound and eggs 5 cents a dozen, I submit that $50,000 a pound is enough for transporting mail to Europe.

I submit to the House that we are going to have something to explain to the people, after voting an increase of $135,000,000 upon the people in postage increase for transporting our mail here at home and a 2-cent tax on every bank check we issue to make up our present deficit, when we provide in this bill that the Government may be required to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars for transporting one pound of mail or one letter to the Orient or to Europe.

So I submit, Mr. Chairman, we would allow sufficient subsidy under my amendment to pay them the very limit that is now possible to be paid to the fastest ocean-going greyhound upon the sea. It was demonstrated before the committee that these ships will earn in passenger carriage an amount almost equal to the amount I have offered in my amendment. So, in all fairness to the airship builders and the public, if we allow them the tremendous subsidy that is now allowed to the ocean-going vessels, we are granting the limit that can in all conscience be granted to the beneficiaries of this act.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, of course, this is the same thing, in another form, that was proposed in the last amendment.

The very purpose of providing the rule that was laid down in the merchant marine act was to enable the Postmaster General to procure the very fastest form of transportation possible.

It is admitted that 25 knots an hour is the maximum rate of speed commercially profitable for a surface vessel. This amendment proposes to pay the same rate provided for surface ships for carrying a load of 20,000 pounds of mail, which is about one-fifth of all the mail that goes from New York to Europe. If a vessel could have been built with the necessary speed, it would have been paid rates calculated according to its speed. But it has been found on calculation that to increase the speed of surface vessels 10 per cent, so as to successfully compete with the Europa or the Bremen, would cost $60,000,000 for each ship, and, of course, that was out of the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The surface ship gets the contract and borrows money to build the ship.

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; it borrows three-quarters of the price of the ship, and airship people do not ask a cent. I say instead of harassing the dirigible people we should give them every encouragement. I ask that the pending amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHALLENBERGER) there were 20 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 2 and 3, strike out "2,000" and insert "2,500."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and members of the commitee, I want to support this bill. I have heard a lot of arguments in favor of it to-day, and the talk about the fast carrying of mails between here and Europe and between the United States and the Orient are persuasive. I am interested in that. But if you are to have airships that can fly only 2,000 miles, where are you going to be when you run out of gas? [Laughter.]

I would like to start the mail on these lighter-than-air ships and have it arrive at some place, and to arrive at some place your ship will have to do better than 2,000 miles. That will not get you to Hawaii and it will not get you to Europe. So, my friends, if you are going to provide for airships carrying the mail across the ocean, you must provide for ships that can go farther than 2,000 miles. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) As used in this act the term "foreign commerce" means commerce between the United States or possessions or Territories of the United States and foreign countries, or between the United States and possessions or Territories of the United States, or between possessions or Territories of the United States, or between foreign countries; the terms "United States," when used in a geographical sense, means the several States and the District of Columbia; and the term "possession of the United States," shall include the Panama Canal Zone.

(b) No air mail contract made pursuant to this act shall obligate the United States to any expenditure thereunder earlier than three years after the approval of this act.

(c) This act may be cited as the "merchant airship act, 1932."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 16, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, however, That all contracts awarded under the provisions of this act shall receive the approval of Congress."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the attitude of the Department of Commerce, as well as the Post Office Department, in taking no decided or definite stand in favor of or against this legislation, coupled with the fact that we are attempting to legislate for a succeeding Congress and that we are reaching at least three years into the future, it occurs to me that at the time when a future Cabinet Officer is called upon to administer the provisions of the act, the Congress then in existence should have an opportunity and some authority to pass on the contracts. I still maintain that this legislation ought to be considered by the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate, and in view of the fact that they had no opportunity to consider or study it, and also because it is not exactly required at this time, we should have the power to review the contracts when the contracts are finally and ultimately entered into. I know as one Member of Congress that I shall support, if a Member at that future time, any fair and reasonable contract to promote this new method of transportation, and I do not believe anyone should be afraid to come before the Congress with a reasonable proposition. Therefore, I ask you to adopt the amendment I have offered in order that the Congress in session at the time might have an opportunity to review the agreement made by the department.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of making an announcement. I have just been handed the result of the vote in the Chicago convention this afternoon upon the nominations for President and for the information of the House I shall read it:

Charles G. Dawes, 1; James M. Wadsworth, jr., 1; Calvin Coolidge, 4½; Joseph I. France, 4; Senator BLAINE, 13; Herbert Hoover, 1,126½.

[Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were—ayes 39, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. RAINEY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOODRUM,

Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8681, to develop American air transport services overseas, to encourage the construction in the United States by American capital of American airships for use in foreign commerce, and to make certain provisions of the maritime law applicable to foreign commerce by airship, and under the rule he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question is ordered on the bill to final passage. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 110, noes 45.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present and I challenge the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-eight Members present, not a quorum. The call is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 146, answered "present" 3, not voting 118, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CROSSER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The doors were opened.

AMENDMENT OF REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. RAGON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented a privileged report on the resolution (H. J. Res. 435) to amend the revenue act of 1932, which was referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 435) in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, what is the matter under consideration that is included in the resolution? Is this another amendment of the revenue act, and what is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. RAGON. The situation is that the Treasury Department finds there are some large oil concerns in this country, refining corporations, which have selling agencies under different incorporations. The Treasury Department finds that millions of gallons of gasoline, in order to avoid payment of taxes, have been turned over to these selling agencies. In all there are about 60,000,000 gallons of gasoline which, unless this measure is passed and made effective by the signature of the President before the 21st day of this month, will be avoiding the taxes, and there will be a loss in taxes to the Government of $17,000,000. The bill provides that where they have impounded only 25,000 gallons or less of gasoline, the amendment that is presented now will not be effective.

With reference to lubricating oil the bill provides that where it has been impounded in an amount above 1,000 gallons, the one who holds the oil shall pay the tax instead of the refiner.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the amendment agreed to the other day it was sought to reach those sales which were negotiated before June 21 but for delivery afterwards. This is to reach the manipulations that are going on to avoid the tax, as far as gasoline and oil are concerned?

Mr. RAGON. That is true.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. BACHARACH. This was a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means, both Republicans as well as Democrats voting for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 435

Resolved, etc., That section 617 of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof a subsection to read as follows:

"(d) There is hereby imposed on gasoline sold by the person (other than the importer thereof or a producer of gasoline) having title to such gasoline on June 21, 1932 (if such person had title on that date to 25,000 or more gallons of gasoline), a tax of 1 cent a gallon, except that under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary the tax shall not apply in the case of sales to a producer of gasoline."

SEC. 2. Section 601 of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof a subsection to read as follows:

"(d) There is hereby imposed upon lubricating oils sold in the United States by the person (other than the manufacturer or producer thereof) having title to such lubricating oils on June 21, 1932 (if such person had title on that date to 1,000 or more gallons of lubricating oil), a tax at the rate of 4 cents a gallon, to be paid by such person."

SEC. 3. Section 620 of the revenue act of 1932 is amended by inserting after "tube," the following: "or lubricating oils taxable under section 601 (c) (1),".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas that the resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether this has anything to do with the tariff which was placed in the tax bill?

Mr. RAGON. Not a thing in the world.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It has this to do with it: The imported gasoline would escape the excise tax, aside from the tax (or duty) on importations, and the oil would also escape its excise tax in certain cases if this resolution is not passed. It happens that most of the gasoline and oil here involved comes from fields outside of the United States. This legislation would place everybody on the same basis and give all persons who are interested in this business an opportunity to operate on the same terms and under the same handicaps with reference to taxation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How does the gentleman feel about it? I am absolutely opposed to this tariff proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is to reach the tax dodgers.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This was a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means, and I was present in the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, the only reason I take time to explain this is because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON], desires to ask a pertinent question, which everybody in the country is interested in. That is the chief reason. There is one particular feature that I did not explain a moment ago.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to know if a transportation company or any other industry that has bought an unlimited amount of oil for its own use previous to June 21, and which does not sell oil, will be required to pay the tax on that oil?

Mr. RAGON. No; I do not think so. The purpose of the bill is merely to catch those parties who, knowing that the bill will become effective on June 21, have gone out and made contracts for a great supply of gasoline and lubricating oil to the different selling agencies, and thereby the producer or importer evades that tax.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit, that it should apply to everybody who is buying gasoline and oil in large quantities to evade the tax.

Mr. RAGON. That is true, but I do not think it would be held that a railroad company which happened to have a stock of oil on hand was trying to evade the tax, for, as the gentleman knows, they are obliged to carry large stocks all the time. They would not be subject to the tax unless they resold the oil.

Mr. WATSON. Many are obliged to have a reserve of 500,000 gallons.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman talks about evading the tax. How about those who are doing it to evade this iniquituous tariff tax?

Mr. RAGON. I do not know about that. The tariff is not involved, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. That will be taken care of at the Democratic convention in Chicago.

Mr. RAGON. The tariff is not involved in this matter. Section 620 of the revenue act is amended by inserting the words "or lubricating oils taxable under section (c) (1)."

I did not explain this to the gentleman from Wisconsin a while ago, because I was interrupted on every side. It is simply a proposition that the taxes on all lubricating oils shall be paid by the producer.

Under the law that we passed the other day, as to lubricating oils that were sold to individuals or companies for the purpose of being mixed or blended with other things, only that part of the oil which was sold to this individual was taxable. The individual had to pay the tax, and therefore it compelled the Government, at a great administrative cost, to go to about 3,000 different retailers and blenders of lubricating oil. Therefore this makes the tax payable by the refineries and causes the Government to have to deal with only about 100 persons.

Mr. DYER. In other words, if the gentleman will permit, it is strictly a sales tax, is it not?

Mr. RAGON. I have stated just how it applies.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. BACHARACH. I know the gentleman wishes to be accurate in his figures. We were told this morning that the Government would have to deal with about 300 persons. The gentleman made the statement that it was 100.

Mr. RAGON. I believe the gentleman from New Jersey is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent will the revenues be effected by change in the mechanism of making the collection?

Mr. RAGON. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. On gasoline we would lose approximately $17,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to the method of collecting the tax on oil, instead of collecting it from the blenders, collecting it from the refineries.

Mr. RAGON. That and the lubricating-oil feature. This tax amounts to about $15,000,000. I have not divided it.

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as the new method of collection on oil is concerned, would it add to the revenues of the Government or decrease them?

Mr. RAGON. No; I would not say it would add to them; but we give the Government an efficient method of collecting the tax. Otherwise they would lose much of the tax, because they would have to get down to these small fellows to collect it.

Mr. SABATH. And it will bring about economies?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. BACHARACH. The gentleman made the statement that we would only have to see 300 persons to collect the tax, provided this bill was passed.

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. If this amendment should not be passed, it would require seeing about 4,000 persons?

Mr. RAGON. I think the figure is 3,000, to be correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I might suggest this comes from the Treasury in an effort to collect the tax.

Mr. RAGON. Yes. The Treasury estimates if we do not pass this amendment 60,000,000 gallons of gasoline alone will escape taxation on June 21.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAGES FOR LABORERS AND MECHANICS EMPLOYED BY CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference report on the bill (S. 3847) to amend the act relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 3847 having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to S. 3847, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the comma after the word " States " and insert in lieu thereof the word " or."

Page 3, lines 8, 9, strike out " or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively."

Page 3, lines 21, 22, strike out " or said commissioners, respectively."

Page 4, line 1, strike out ", if the contract be with the United States, or to the credit of the District of Columbia if the contract be with the District of Columbia."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House have held full conference with the managers on the part of the Senate on the bill S. 3847. We have agreed to the Senate wishes to strike out all reference to the Canal Zone and the Territories. These references were eliminated because of an objection by the Secretary of War that the administration would be exceedingly complicated and expensive, and that it would be necessary for the Secretary of Labor to open labor offices in Panama, for which no appropriation is provided. The rate of wages of the great majority of Government employees in the Canal Zone is fixed by the governor in conformance with the provisions of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912. The Governor of the Canal Zone has recommended that no legislation be enacted by Congress which seriously affects the operation of the canal and the construction of allied projects until a committee of Congress has visited the canal and made a complete study of the effects of such legislation. Therefore, in view of the evident complications which would arise out of appliance of this act to the Canal Zone and the Territories, the managers on the part of the House thought it wise to agree to the Senate proposal.

The managers on the part of the House have also agreed to the Senate proposal to eliminate references to the District of Columbia and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia where these references are not compatible to the purpose of the bill. These words were written in in the House of Representatives at a time when the bill provided that contractors on public works and buildings should be reimbursed for increased wages, and that the Government should reduce the contract price by the amount of any decrease in wages. Some projects are constructed by the District of Columbia out of funds belonging to the District of Columbia, and consequently the bill was amended so that rebates might be paid directly to the District. However, the section providing for these rebates was stricken from the bill, and in order to correct the language the House managers have agreed to the Senate proposals to eliminate the various references to the District Commissioners and the District of Columbia.

WILLIAM P. CONNERY, JR.,
R. A. GREEN,
ROBERT RAMSPECK,
RICHARD J. WELCH,
W. F. KOPP,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the Senate conferees agreed to all the amendments placed in the bill by the House. In addition the Senate conferees wished to strike out the provisions which included the Panama Canal and the Territories in the bill. That was done because they felt it would be too expensive to carry out the purposes of the bill in the Panama Canal and the Territories. A letter was received from the Secretary of War objecting to those provisions and it was believed by the conferees of both House and Senate that the Secretary of Labor would be forced to place an office of the Department of Labor at the Panama Canal and that they would be obliged to send a representative of the department to the Territories, Alaska and Hawaii. So the House conferees agreed with the Senate conferees in taking out those provisions of the bill.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT AND COTTON

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 261, providing for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, a joint resolution authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls up a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 261

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, a resolution authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire any time?

Mr. PURNELL. Does the gentleman intend to use any time on the resolution?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Just a few minutes.

Mr. PURNELL. I think the House is familiar with the resolution. I have no desire to use all of 30 minutes, but I will ask the gentleman to yield me some time, and I will endeavor to yield it all back.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 30 minutes. This is a resolution for the consideration of a House joint resolution which donates an additional 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the Red Cross or such other organization as it shall designate for distribution. There is a new departure in the resolution. It donates 500,000 bales of cotton for distribution, to be made into cloth. The important feature of this resolution is that the wheat may be exchanged for other foods. As I understand it, the experience of the Red Cross was—as the Committee on Rules was told—that in the big cities they had difficulty in handling the wheat donated in March, and even the flour made from the wheat. Under this resolution the wheat may be exchanged for food of all kinds and the cotton may be exchanged for cloth.

The Agricultural Committee did have in mind offering some amendments to this resolution, but I understand the committee has withdrawn the same and that there will be no substantial amendments offered to the resolution which will interfere with this wheat being exchangeable for food. Those more familiar with the wheat and cotton conditions will explain the resolution in detail.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. In other words, the Red Cross will be allowed to sell this wheat?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; exchange it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the committee receive any testimony as to how the former 40,000,000 bushels of wheat donated to the Red Cross had been administered?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The figures are given in the report; but, as I understand, they have distributed about 25,000,000 bushels, about half of which went to livestock. They have on hand 15,000,000 bushels, which they expect will not last later than September 1. The distribution was made in every State of the Union.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I rise for information concerning the shipment of some of this wheat. I am for this resolution, and I am for the distribution of the wheat.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I suggest to the gentleman that I might not be able to answer his question, and it would be better for the gentleman to wait until we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution? Then those familiar with all of these conditions will undoubtedly answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the House joint resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this resolution is somewhat similar to the one passed a few months ago which provided for the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat through the American National Red Cross. Twenty-five million bushels have been distributed under that resolution, some of it going into every State of the American Union. A report has been prepared and will go in the RECORD showing the manner in which distribution was made. Many fine reports from all over the country show the good results of this distribution.

The pending measure provides for making available 40,000,000 bushels of additional wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton.

The report of the Red Cross shows they have enough wheat on hand to last until about September 1. Congress will meet again in December. The stabilization corporations of the Farm Board have these commodities on hand. They are gradually eating themselves up in storage, insurance, and other carrying charges.

We are all familiar, through reports, with the distress existing in America. I do not believe any finer disposition could be made of these commodities, which the Government has through these stabilization corporations, than to make this distribution. This will not only feed the hungry, but will get these commodities off the market and prevent them from continuing to be a drug on the market. I believe the commodities in the hands of the stabilization corporations should be disposed of and then I think the program of direct buying and selling under Government supervision, through stabilization corporations, should be ended. [Applause.] If we can get proper disposition of the commodities they have on hand, I do not think there will be any disposition to keep that program from being ended, and that part of the act which provides for them repealed. The time is late and I see no reason for further discussion.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. For a brief question.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman propose to offer the committee amendments that were approved in the committee providing for feed for livestock in areas where they may have crop failures?

Mr. JONES. I propose to offer the amendment which provides for feed for livestock in the 1932 crop-failure areas.

The other amendment was adopted after I had appeared before the Rules Committee, and the amendment was not disclosed to the Rules Committee. It is regarded by them as a substantial amendment, and they would not permit the measure to be brought up if I insisted on offering this as a committee amendment. I must keep faith with them. I do not feel at liberty to offer that amendment. I have talked with all but three of the members of the committee, and I may state that I called up the American Red Cross and they said there would be very little wheat exchanged for commodities other than those into which wheat went as an ingredient.

Mr. ANDRESEN. If the gentleman will yield further, I may say in connection with the other amendment which was agreed to in committee——

Mr. JONES. Yes; it was agreed to in committee.

Mr. ANDRESEN. It provided that the wheat should be exchanged for other food where a substantial portion of that food was of flour.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. And the same provision was adopted as to the exchange of cotton for cloth or for other goods where a substantial portion of the goods were made of cotton. So both commodities were treated in the same way, and unless we adopt the amendment relating to wheat it means we will still have our wheat surplus upon the American market, that it will not help agriculture, and that the farmers will have to bear the entire burden.

Mr. JONES. I have kept faith by not offering either wing of the amendment. While in sympathy with the purposes of both, I was not at liberty to offer either. If the gentleman wishes to oppose the bill, that is his privilege.

I will simply state that the American Red Cross has handled this matter in every State of the Union and has exchanged it for food products, largely those into which flour went, and they will do this again. If you go to putting restrictions around them, it will prove a handicap. They found they were handicapped, especially in the cities, because of restrictions, and this was an effort to give them full leeway so that the best possible results might be accomplished.

As to the committee amendment, it was not disclosed to the Rules Committee, because it was adopted after I appeared before that committee. I found, after talking with various members—and I am sorry I did not get to see the gentleman—that as the bill could not come up otherwise, it would be better to have it offered in this way than to have the whole bill killed, and I had to make this concession. It was my own fault to a considerable degree, because I did not go back to the Rules Committee after our committee had adopted that amendment.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. For a question; yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Does the same provision about exchange apply to cotton?

Mr. JONES. It does, as is provided in the bill itself. However, an amendment will be offered, I understand, to make it so that wheat can only be exchanged for food products and cotton for clothing products.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. I want to know if the charges that are necessary to be paid before this wheat and cotton are released will be paid from the revolving fund furnished the Farm Board, or will there be a special appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. There is an authorization for payment of what the commercial banks hold against these commodities and carrying charges up to the time when the Red Cross makes a requisition for it.

Mr. COLTON. And that will be paid out of a special appropriation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes; for a question.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I wish the gentleman would advise the committee why they did not dispose of all the cotton on hand instead of only 500,000 bales.

Mr. JONES. I wish that might be done. However, when we pass this measure the amount covered by it will be tied up subject to storage charges and other costs. It is definitely allocated. A considerable amount is covered by this measure. We will be back here in December, and, if this plan works out, we can take care of the rest of it at that time.

I decline to yield further.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to stand on the floor and oppose any measure for the relief of destitution or distress. But I believe it ought to be called to the attention of the House that so far in this session Congress has done very little, if anything, for the relief of agriculture; and there is some question in my mind that in passing this bill we may, instead of doing something for the farmer by giving the Red Cross the surplus wheat, be doing something to him.

On the 3d day of March the House passed a bill donating 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the Red Cross, and the price of May future in Chicago on that date was 62 cents. The price of July futures for wheat in Chicago yesterday was 50 cents. Wheat has gone down 12 cents a bushel since we started giving it away.

Now, we may expect that as soon as we start giving this wheat away it is not going to help the price.

It is true that there has been a great deal of destitution relieved by the donation of this wheat, and I think some benefit might accrue from the donation of this amount of wheat. But I want to call attention to the fact that this bill differs from the preceding bill, in that this bill takes wheat that is not needed for destitution and donates it to the Red Cross and says that organization may trade it for other food. The entire theory on which we can justify giving away this wheat is that it is needed to relieve distress. In passing this bill we are giving away wheat that is concededly not needed because we are asked to give authority to the Red Cross and other agencies to trade it for beefsteak or bologna or anything in the way of food.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I have been in touch with the Red Cross and not one bushel was exchanged except for flour, which comes from the wheat. They have asked that this might be done only in the big cities.

Mr. HOPE. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment providing that it might be exchanged for flour and bread or other products of wheat?

Mr. CELLER. That would do no good in the cities, because they have not the means whereby to bake flour into bread. The large bakeries are opposed to the Red Cross exchanging this for bread. We want to take the flour and have it exchanged for the ordinary foodstuffs, like dry groceries and breakfast food.

Mr. HOPE. The statement of the gentleman is an illustration of what I pointed out. We are going to take wheat out of the stocks of the Farm Board and ask the miller to mill it at cost, without profit to him, and then take the wheat and trade it for some other food supply, and thus sell it in competition with the farmer's wheat and the miller's flour. It does not seem to me that a transaction of that kind can work for the benefit of the farmer, because we are certainly taking some wheat that is not needed and selling it in competition with him. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I want to take two minutes' time to call attention to one provision that may meet the inquiry of some Members here. Why, I think you will ask, is it necessary to make an additional appropriation of wheat when the report shows a balance of 15,000,000 bushels still on hand for distribution by the Red Cross?

The report of the Red Cross is to the effect that the amount on hand will last approximately to September 1. We will not have an opportunity to act upon this additional allotment before December, and consequently this additional amount is made available; but, calling attention to lines 3 to 7, on page 2 of the bill, this additional allotment is to be used only in case the request has the approval of the President of the United States, and he asks such an allotment shall be made. That places in the hands of the President the power to meet any situation that might possibly arise before Congress convenes in December. It seems to me this is a wholesome provision, and I hope there will be no serious opposition to it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the committee, I will state that farm prices are still going down, unemployment is increasing, and winter is coming on. We have millions of hungry and naked people to-day. In the meantime we have millions of bushels of wheat and around 13,000,000 bales of surplus cotton that are hanging around the necks of farmers of this country like a millstone. When the President of the Red Cross came before our committee he stated that he had just as many demands for cloth and clothing as he did for food and food products.

I regret very much that the committee did not report the resolution authorizing 1,000,000 bales of cotton, as introduced by me. I am sure it will work to a wonderful advantage for all concerned if this cotton is turned over to the Red Cross as outlined in the resolution. First, we have in mind clothing needy people who are out of work and out of money. In the next place, it will give to cotton mills that are now shutting down, extra work which will enable them to keep their employees working. However, I contend that until something is done to give farmers a fair price for their products all Congress has done will not relieve the serious economic situation that now exists. Until relief is granted to agriculture it is my opinion that under my resolution we have a wonderful opportunity to get rid of this surplus wheat and cotton.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to announce to the House that word has just been received from Chicago, from the Republican Convention, that that convention by an overwhelming vote, has renominated for Vice President of the United States, a distinguished Kansan, a distinguished American, Hon. Charles Curtis, of Kansas. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, no one can say very much in two minutes regarding this bill. The membership of the House will recall on the 1st of March last we appropriated 40,000,000 bushels of this wheat, and that up to this time already 25,000,000 bushels of that wheat have been disposed of. If we go upon the theory that we would appropriate no more, we would not have left exceeding 3,000,000 bushels of wheat per month from now to the 1st of December. I am of opinion that neither under the provisions of this bill, nor under the provisions of any other bill which we are likely to pass, should we make it possible for the Red Cross or any other organization to use this wheat for any purpose except in exchange for wheat products. As relates to cotton, the Red Cross should be permitted to use it only for exchange of cotton goods. That is the legitimate purpose and the purpose which I have in mind in supporting this legislation. I think we have done a good piece of work in wheat distribution so far, and I would regret very much to see any other method pursued than the one which I have outlined, because we might thereby bring down on the Red Cross organization criticism which would inure to its injury and to the injury of the Congress.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. This question is not asked in any critical sense, but I note the language of the bill with reference to cotton includes not only cloth but also wearing apparel.

Mr. LARSEN. An amendment has been prepared to take care of that. Under the provisions of that amendment, if adopted, the purpose that I have outlined will be carried into effect.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the Government wheat which has been distributed in my city, a city of 2,000,000 people, with six or seven hundred thousand people in acute distress, has been a godsend. It has been distributed in the nature of bread and flour products to hungry children in the schools.

Many families would be absolutely hungry and in danger of starvation if it were not for this flour, because our public and private welfare funds have been exhausted. Just last Monday it was estimated by John C. Cowan, chairman of the distribution committee, that the amount of these bread products distributed to starving people amounted to tens of thousands of dollars. We look for more acute distress this fall and winter. We need more flour and wheat products. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, in May there was shipped to Cheyenne from Chicago a large amount of wheat at 41 cents per hundredweight freight. At that same time in Cheyenne wheat was selling for from 30 to 35 cents a bushel. I am in favor of this legislation. I voted for it before; but if that sort of thing continues, it would seem to me that some one ought to be privileged to discover why so much freight is paid when they can buy the wheat there for about that same price laid down.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I might say that shipping the flour to that same point would cost exactly the same amount that the wheat cost. They have a mill and wheat transit rate that would permit them to ship wheat to that point, mill it into flour, and ship it out just as cheaply as if sent there in flour in the original instance. Therefore it did not cost any more.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I know where there is a large amount of wheat at a closer point that might have been available. I call the attention of the House to that fact.

Mr. FULMER. But the freight on the wheat did not amount to any more than the freight on the flour would that you would have had to ship to that point.

There was quite a lot of this wheat shipped to South Carolina and milled by the mills in South Carolina for the benefit of the labor and the benefit of the mills, and we did not lose one dime by doing it rather than shipping the flour.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am glad to have some explanation of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, on May 24 I introduced House Joint Resolution 403, which has been merged with the pending resolution. Flour has been distributed to each of the 48 States and to the District of Columbia. In the short time I have I can only give the totals. There were 1,964,894 barrels of flour. There were 2,423,367 families assisted. There were 220,079 tons of stock feed approved.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the figures for the States, as I have only given the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FIGURES GIVEN BY MR. MARKHAM, OF THE FEDERAL FARM BOARD, JUNE 16, 1932

Eighty-eight million five hundred thousand bushels of wheat actually held in elevators on June 1 and in transit; 350,000,000 to 450,000,000 bushels estimated in private elevators; 51 cents a bushel present market price; $13,200,000, or 15 cents a bushel, is present carrying charges of Federal Farm Board per year.

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1932.

Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LONERGAN: In accordance with your telephone request of yesterday, June 9, you will find attached a statement giving you the information for which you asked pertaining to wheat distribution and the families benefiting by this distribution.

I trust that this statement embodies all of the information which you desire.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES L. FIESER, Acting Chairman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any legislation has passed this body since I have been a Member of it that has done more good than the bill that was passed a short time ago which gave 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to feed the hungry of our land. When that bill came to our committee it came as a Senate bill, introduced by Senator NORBECK, to relieve five States out in the West which had had a drought. It was the wisdom of our committee that that should be broadened so that it might be made to apply to the entire United States. I offered an amendment in the committee to strike out everything after the enacting clause and insert the language that we placed in the bill, and every Member of this Congress that voted on that except two, as I remember, voted for it.

The present bill is simply carrying that plan farther. There are only 15,000,000 bushels of wheat left now to last until September. It will soon be gone. Then will come the fall season when our people will be in greater distress than they are now, and we ought to vote for this. I would vote twice that much. There is a greater principle back of this than taking care of the price of wheat or the price of cotton. This is saving lives, and they are going to suffer if we do not take care of them. I say that any man who votes for this will not have the criticism of any man who has the spirit of humanity in him that he should have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that this wheat is not needed and therefore we are donating it. On the contrary, it is very much needed. It is needed to maintain the market, as provided in the declared policy of the Farm Board act. That is, to maintain advantageous domestic markets.

The board bought 329,000,000 bushels of wheat. For what purpose? To remove the surplus from the market, to give the wheat grower the benefit of the tariff. The wheat cost 81 cents a bushel. Wheat can be bought to-day for 49 cents a bushel. As a result of donating 40,000,000 bushels of wheat a few days ago, the price has gone down to the lowest point it has been in a number of decades. It was 49 cents yesterday, and, as was stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] it has dropped 12 cents because of the donation of the 40,000,000 bushels, some weeks ago.

Now, the unfortunate thing about donating the 40,000,000 bushels is the fact that it is donated at the expense of the wheat growers, and if the wheat growers are satisfied I take it that we should take no exception; but it also affects the price of corn. Wheat is to be substituted for corn and used as feed, thereby depressing the price of corn. If there is any doubt about it, let me quote a member of the Farm Board, so that we know exactly what we are doing. I quote from Mr. Denman. He makes it clear——

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. We did not use any cotton before, and cotton has been declining ever since.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, that is right, but we know why wheat has declined, and the gentleman will find out, if the 500,000 bales are placed on the market, why cotton will decline. The gentleman has not yet had that experience, but after he has had that experience, he will have the same experience as the wheat growers and the corn growers in the past.

If we want to do the charitable thing, why not save the Treasury the expense of this costly wheat? This wheat cost $36,000,000. It can be bought on the market for less than $20,000,000, and the market for both wheat and corn will not be depressed.

Let me read what Mr. Denman said. Mr. Denman makes it clear that—

> Any amount taken out would affect the market. It will be done solely at the expense of the revolving fund. To obtain this wheat we would have to purchase other wheat to pay off the loan for the amount of wheat let out, thus reducing the amount of money left for loans to the cooperatives.

As stated in the hearings, the cost of the wheat to the board was 81 cents a bushel. The funds were depleted $36,000,000, at the expense of the Federal Treasury, and reduced the funds available for loans to the farmer $36,000,000, thus not only crippling the Farm Board to the extent of $36,000,000, but also reduced the funds available for loans to aid the farmers in marketing their commodities.

Had Congress appropriated $20,000,000—the value of the wheat at the time it was turned over—instead of donating 40,000,000 bushels of wheat—which cost the Federal Treasury $36,000,000—and had the Red Cross used the money to buy wheat, corn, or other feed, it would not only have left the funds of the Farm Board intact, but would have maintained the advanced price of wheat, and stimulated the price of corn, and the gain to the farmers would have been millions of dollars in price received for their commodities. Unfortunately, since the wheat was substituted for corn, corn was sold at the lowest price in 30 years. May corn is 30 to 31 cents at Chicago. Sensational reports of heavy crop failures have resulted, as is usual, in speculators advancing the price of wheat recently.

The aim of representative farm groups and friends of the farmers and Congress for a number of years has been to redeem the platform pledges of the major parties to place the farmer on an equality with industry and labor—in other words, to restore a parity between prices of agricultural commodities and the products of industry and labor.

It is needless to say that the three and a half billion dollars deficit for the two years can not be reduced by depleting the Federal Treasury $36,000,000 when $20,000,000 would have done the job better and without injury to the corn grower, nor can the farmer be bettered by thus lowering the price of his commodities.

The donation was not only at the expense of the Federal Treasury of $36,000,000 but at many times that amount to the producers, unless the 40,000,000 bushels donated are replaced by the purchase of 40,000,000 bushels to take it off the market, as suggested by Mr. Denman. In short, donating the wheat instead of cash not only defeated the purpose of the act but killed the goose that laid the golden egg. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary to make available, at any time prior to August 1, 1933, to the American National Red Cross, and any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross, 40,000,000 bushels of wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation and 1,000,000 bales of cotton of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation, for use in providing food, cloth, and wearing apparel for the needy and distressed people of the United States and Territories. Such wheat or cotton shall be delivered upon application therefor, but only upon the approval of the President of the United States, and in such amounts to each organization as the President may approve.

With the following committee amendment:

> Page 1, line 8, strike out "1,000,000" and insert "500,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word to my friends representing farming districts. There has not been a measure brought before this House in the last 10 years, for the benefit of agriculture, that I did not vote for, and in one or two instances I was the only man from the East who did vote for it.

Now, the relief provided in this resolution means life to thousands of people in my city. This wheat at the present time is held by the Farm Board and it was purchased by public funds. My State contributed to that public fund just as much as any other State, if not more.

It has been said that this wheat will be taken out and put into the market. Certainly it will. It is said that it will affect the sale of flour. Of course, it will. It is only temporary. The use of this wheat can not affect the price of wheat. Let us be frank about these things. As long as that wheat is in existence it is bound to have a permanent, constant depressing effect upon the price of wheat. The quicker it is consumed the better for the wheat grower.

When the 40,000,000 bushel resolution was before us I attempted to offer a modest amendment which I prepared after consulting every member of the Committee on Agriculture and gentlemen from the farming districts, to permit the processing of wheat into flour and flour into bread.

But, Mr. Chairman, it did not work out in the city. Of the 40,000,000 bushels authorized by the previous resolution New York City did not get one pound. My colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] and I literally went down on our bended knees to ask the Red Cross to construe the previous resolution so we could use this flour for food. I pointed out when the previous resolution was before us that we have not the facilities in the tenement-house districts for baking. The cost of gas is very high. We are up against a local condition in converting flour into bread. We do not want individual recipients to exchange the flour. That surely would not be wise.

The mechanics of the exchange are simply these: That the wheat is delivered to the Red Cross. The Red Cross changes it into flour and delivers it to the established charitable organizations of New York City, the C. O. S., the A. I. C. P., the United Hebrew Charities, the Catholic Charities, and I think the Salvation Army.

Now, it may be they may use this for bread. It may be they may use this for other flour products, but in the event, Mr. Chairman, that it is necessary to save a family to give them a little coffee, tea, and sugar that they may require, all we ask is to make this law sufficiently broad to permit such an exchange.

I have come before this House time and time again not only this session but the previous session pleading for help, asking for relief of the unemployed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and myself appeared before the Agricultural Committee. We asked for this wheat then, last session. We were laughed at and ridiculed at the time. They said we were pessimistic, that everything would be all right.

I am not overstating it when I tell you that distress in the big cities is growing and almost beyond control.

What will the people of our city think, knowing that 40,000,000 bushels of wheat were authorized, that a great deal of it went for feed—and you have a right to use it for that—but when they ask for bread they can not get it?

Now, please, gentlemen, do not be too technical in this instance. Give us a chance to take this wheat that we are handing out for distribution and use it for food within the intent of this resolution.

I ask you to cooperate with us in this instance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 2, line 2, after the word "for," insert a comma and the following: "and in providing feed for livestock in the 1932 crop-failure areas."

Mr. JONES. I do not think I care to make any statement about the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. If an explanation is desired I will be glad to make it. This particular amendment was suggested by the American National Red Cross. It was included in substance in the previous measure and it provides that in some of the 1932 crop-failure areas they may use wheat for feed purposes in order to save the livestock. They only used it in sections of very great distress, and it provided a wonderful service in those sections.

I do not think there is any objection to the amendment from the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to carry into effect a like provision for the 1932 crop-failure areas as was provided in the last act for the 1931 crop-failure areas?

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent has the wheat been used for this purpose up to date?

Mr. JONES. There was a considerable percentage. I have not the figures here.

Mr. STAFFORD. After we authorize the taking over of this additional 40,000,000 bushels of wheat how much wheat will be left in the possession of the Farm Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. JONES. At the present time there is around 94,000,000 bushels in the hands of the Government. This bill would take an additional 40,000,000 bushels and would leave, in round numbers, 54,000,000 bushels. They have gradually disposed of some of it. These figures are approximate.

Mr. STAFFORD. As for the cotton, it was testified this morning before the special committee investigating Government competition with private industry that there are 1,300,000 bales of cotton in the possession of the Government.

Mr. JONES. Correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which the Government has bought at high prices and is holding at great loss.

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. By this bill it is proposed to take 500,000 of the 1,300,000 bales of cotton. Is there any proposal before the Agriculture Committee that would dispose of the other 54,000,000 bushels of wheat, which are a drag on the market, keeping down the price of wheat, and dispose of the other 800,000 bales of cotton which have a like effect?

Mr. JONES. There are a number of measures of varying types pending before the committee, but it is rather difficult for a busy committee to take away the management from those who are in charge of the disposition of these commodities.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only prospect of disposing of them ultimately is to do as we are doing to-day—give them to the Red Cross.

Mr. JONES. No; that is not exactly correct. They have tried to dispose of them. I am hoping that if this is adopted the remainder of the wheat may be kept entirely off the American market until there is a materially better price.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I am willing to do this so as to remove its potential effects from the market in keeping down the price of cotton and wheat.

Mr. JONES. I think at least no one can gainsay the advantage and advisability of this action.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Following up the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, when the bill was first under consideration, the original bill, there were still 200,000,000 bushels of wheat in the hands of the Grain Stabilization Corporation. The gentleman has just stated that that corporation now has on hand 94,000,000 bushels; and when this bill is passed, there will remain 54,000,000 bushels. Can the gentleman state for the information of the committee what happened to the other 100,000,000 bushels in the last few months?

Mr. JONES. The board announced the policy of selling not to exceed 5,000,000 bushels per month. At the time the previous bill was passed they only had 146,000,000 bushels on hand. They had had more than 200,000,000 bushels, but it had been gradually disposed of; they have sold some abroad. As I have stated, they announced the policy of disposing of not to exceed 5,000,000 bushels a month.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Texas if he knows how many millions of bushels of wheat under the last bill went for the feeding of livestock in these drought-stricken areas?

Mr. LONERGAN. I will say to the gentleman that I procured those figures from the Red Cross, and they will be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will find those figures in the report. The report shows how many millions of bushels of wheat were used in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. With all the earnestness of which I am possessed, I desire to supplement the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. The previous bill, approved March 7, 1932, authorized the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross for relief of the poor and distressed to the extent of 40,000,000 bushels.

In the distribution the Red Cross has rendered a fine service and has rescued many families from starvation. The following clipping from the New York Times shows clearly the extensive relief made possible by the first 40,000,000 bushels of wheat:

RELIEF FLOUR GOING TO 10,000,000 NEEDY—RED CROSS AIDS IN ALL STATES WITH 40,000,000 BUSHELS OF WHEAT VOTED BY CONGRESS—PENNSYLVANIA TOPS LIST—250,701 FAMILIES HELPED THERE, WITH 92,959 IN NEW YORK—SUPPLY MAY LAST THROUGH SUMMER

WASHINGTON, May 28.—More than 10,000,000 persons are receiving flour from the Red Cross out of the 40,000,000 bushels of Farm Board wheat voted to it by Congress for distribution among those in need, the Red Cross announced to-day.

Applications for 1,703,813 barrels of flour for 2,224,701 families in 2,672 Red Cross chapter jurisdictions have been approved. About three-fourths of the 3,072 counties in the United States asked for such aid, and flour is being distributed in all States, the District of Columbia, and Alaska.

The largest distribution is for Pennsylvania, where 250,701 families are to be aided. Illinois is second with 151,621 families. In New York State 92,959 families are listed; in New Jersey, 63,921; and in Connecticut, 29,773.

Applications for 218,000 tons of livestock feed have been approved for 178,647 stock owners.

The total requisitions have consumed 23,718,177 bushels of the 40,000,000, flour orders totaling 12,818,177 bushels and livestock feed 10,900,000.

Officials estimate that if the flour distribution continues at the present rate, the remaining wheat may last through the summer.

The distribution began on March 7, and already some communities have sent in a second order. This, the Red Cross said, was caused by underestimation of needs in the first order, the extention of relief, or to increased unemployment.

Requirements by States for flour and feed and the number of families aided are shown in this table:

State	Families aided by flour	Barrels of flour approved
Alaska	1,310	781
Alabama	40,318	44,377

In the large cities, however, like New York, although the law permitted exchange of wheat for flour—the cost of processing and milling to come out of the wheat—the local chapters of the Red Cross could do nothing with the flour. When the Red Cross brought the flour to the poor in Brooklyn and New York City, they found these wretched, impoverished families did not have the fuel or the money to purchase gas or electricity or the ingredients for baking in order to convert the flour into bread. The flour was simply useless under such conditions. Thus the needy, the poor of New York had to go without. Just think of it, granaries bursting with grain and yet the poor of the cities starve. That was and still is intolerable. We did all in our power to persuade Judge Payne, the head of the American National Red Cross, and we did all within our power to persuade the Solicitor General of the United States, Judge Thacher, who is the counsel of the Red Cross, to interpret the previous bill to permit the American Red Cross through its local chapters, particularly in the large cities like Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and New York, to exchange flour for food, like potatoes, bread, and dry groceries, sugar, and coffee. However, we could not get these gentlemen to budge one inch in the interest of the poor people in those large cities. In justice to them I must say they desired to do so but felt constrained to deny our request because of the rigid terms of the bill.

The Red Cross had, however, persuaded the large wholesale grocers and bakers and the large chain-store operators to take this flour and give other food in return, but before effecting the exchange Judge Payne asked us to get an amendment to the statute giving him that power of exchange.

We went to the Agricultural Committee and asked for enabling legislation. The committee were considering a bill for a second 40,000,000 bushels. We persuaded the gentleman from Texas, Chairman MARVIN JONES, to write into the second bill the right to exchange the wheat or flour for other food. The bill is now before you. The amount of other food that will be exchanged will be comparatively trifling in amount, yet you will be doing genuine charity to the poor and distressed of my city. In New York, or rather Brooklyn, the Red Cross will and has distributed through the following agencies: The Salvation Army, the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, St. Vincent de Paul Society, the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor, and United Jewish Aid Societies—I am an officer of the latter organization.

Dire distress, bitter poverty, stalks the land. Relief is imperative. Otherwise I shudder at the consequences of failure to succor the needy, the halt, the lame, and the feeble. Private charity has spent itself. Public charity, governmental charity is necessary. You must pass this bill. In New York City the emergency unemployment relief committee has been doing a fine job under the benevolent and wise guidance of Harvey D. Gibson. This organization is the central distributing agency of the Red Cross in the five boroughs of New York. It in turn coordinates and works with all the local borough charity societies. The emergency unemployment relief committee has raised millions of dollars for the idle. But the work and the need seems unending. Governmental help is imperative. This bill will greatly help.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Why did not your charitable organizations bake the flour and make it into bread?

Mr. CELLER. It costs almost five times the cost of the flour to bake it into bread, so it was utterly impossible to do that. The cost, which must come out of the wheat, was prohibitive. However, some of the wheat was baked into bread, gratis, by some of the bakers.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's position, but does not the gentleman think that an amendment which would limit the exchange to flour, bread, or products of wheat would be sufficient to give him the relief which he desires?

Mr. CELLER. No; it would not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me suggest to the gentleman that Judge Payne will keep these exchanges down to the minimum.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is correct. As the gentleman suggests, Judge Payne, of the American National Red Cross, will keep this exchange down to a minimum. He will, so far as it is within his power, have the exchanges confined to bread, to crackers, to cakes, to pies, if you please, to breakfast foods, and to all those commodities of which wheat is an essential and substantial part. But he must not be limited to products of wheat. I will say to the gentleman that I am sure you can rely upon my word and rely upon the word of Judge Payne in that respect, because he is in charge of this charitable distribution through his local chapters all over the United States, that he will, so far as is humanly possible and consistent with proper alleviation of distress, confine exchanges to wheat products.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. New York City, on a population basis, would have been entitled to a distribution of 5 per cent of the total of the first 40,000,000 bushels of wheat voted for. Five per cent of 40,000,000 bushels is 2,000,000 bushels. Yet New York City did not, because it could not use the flour, get anything at all to speak of. It is entitled to the fair consideration which the pending bill will give. It should receive not only its share of the second 40,000,000 bushels of wheat in the form of food but its share of the first 40,000,000 bushels as well. Upon this I shall insist. I hereby serve notice upon the Red Cross as to this.

The Red Cross did not want to give flour to individuals, and let them run to the grocery stores, where it would be traded in at a ridiculously low exchange rate. That is what we prevented for you.

Mr. CELLER. That is what would happen. The family in their misery possessed of a bag of flour would run to the nearest grocer and exchange it. The cupidity of many tradesmen might cause the poor family to become the victim of a sharp bargain.

I am aware that the Members from the wheat States are fearful lest the exchange privilege will in effect defeat the purpose of the bill, which is to relieve distress and at the same time reduce by consumption the quantity of wheat in the country. If flour is exchanged for coffee or sugar, the sugar and coffee is consumed but the wheat remains. That is true. But to do a great good, let us do a little harm. There is never a perfect solution or a perfect answer. In practice, even if you give the New York poor family the flour, they would not, could not use it. They would sell or exchange it. The flour would, in any event, remain unconsumed. Let the Red Cross make the exchange.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD: Page 1, line 6, after the words "Red Cross," strike out "and any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "To the governors of the several States, Commonwealths, and Territories of the United States, and any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross, or the governors of the several States, Commonwealths, and Territories of the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I would like to know what objection the gentleman's committee has to making this wheat available to the governors of the several States, Commonwealths, and Territories of the United States as well as to the American Red Cross.

Mr. JONES. I will state to the gentleman that after investigation the committee reached the conclusion it was better to have the responsibility in one central organization. This organization has the authority to utilize, and it has exercised the privilege of utilizing, many local organizations in administering the provisions of the old act. The American National Red Cross has the confidence of everyone and has done such a fine piece of work, generally speaking, that I think it would be a mistake to divide the responsibility and probably induce disputes between different organizations.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CLANCY. There were a few months ago 10,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canadian elevators, mostly in Ontario, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what has become of that American wheat in Canadian elevators?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry I can not tell the gentleman, but I am sure if he will call up the Farm Board they will give him the information.

Mr. CLANCY. But the point is that the rental or storage of this wheat in Canada is a very large item, amounting to about two and a half million dollars a year, and it is also true that as we dispose of this wheat we cut down the total amount of $28,000,000 which we are paying for storage and carrying charges in American and Canadian elevators.

Mr. JONES. I am sure the storage is no more in Canada than it is here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee. In view of the statement of the distinguished chairman I will withdraw my amendment.

I am going to support this measure authorizing the distribution of 40,000,000 additional bushels of Government-owned wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton for the purpose of providing food, cloth, and wearing apparel to relieve the distressed people of the United States. This resolution provides that the wheat, cotton, or produce thereof may be milled, processed, or manufactured into or exchanged for flour, food, cloth, or wearing apparel. The value of this wheat and cotton now on hand is being gradually eaten up by interest, storage, and insurance charges. The humanitarian thing to do is to make it available to the American people for relief purposes. By so doing we will help the farmer in removing this surplus and in extending relief to human misery.

My bill provided for the distribution of 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, and, further, provided for a different method of distribution. I proposed to utilize the governors of the States, who, in turn, will utilize the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other patriotic, charitable, and relief organizations, and the Red Cross.

The widespread unemployment and business depression still holds our country in its grasp. The situation demands the most serious and thoughtful consideration of Congress and every patriotic American citizen. These are abnormal times. A crisis is here. The very foundation of our Government and social order is tottering and in danger. The situation is as serious as any war in which our country has engaged.

In tragic times like these no one desires to load unnecessary burdens or responsibilities either on individuals or the Nation. However, we must face the realities of the present. Careful study and thoughtful consideration has been given to the situation. Legislation for relief based upon careful thought and consideration has been proposed. Bills have been passed that have brought some measure of relief, and others are pending. Congress has endeavored to stabilize industry, agriculture, and commerce.

Objections have been made to certain legislation on the ground that it was a "dole," meaning that the measures looked to the public as distinguished from private aid. The charge of "dole" and "pork" legislation must be squarely met. American citizens must not starve while we quibble over words. Emergency measures to bridge the unparalleled distress resulting from the unemployment situation have been and must be passed by Congress. Help has gone to the afflicted of other lands. Local resources have been exhausted. States, cities, municipalities, political subdivisions, charitable and relief organizations are no longer able to cope with the situation.

Under normal conditions, in a democratic form of government such as ours, we should rightfully rely upon those organizations to care for our destitute American citizens who are suffering from want, privation, and hunger. Radical and unusual situations all rightfully go for reversal of beliefs. Words and slogans damning and beclouding the true purposes of legislation should not cause us to neglect our duty to mankind. The total number of people needing relief is greater now than it ever has been before. Savings have been exhausted, friends and relatives borrowed from; credit is gone; and the man or woman who never before has been out of a job is "up against it." Federal assistance is necessary. Measures that will provide employment until the wheels of industry move again are urgent and necessary. Our people must work. That is the cure for unemployment.

I have supported and will vote for any measure, Republican or Democratic, that will help provide employment or relief for existing conditions. Many times direct aid has been given for the needs of our peoples and the peoples of other lands. We have many precedents to prove this. The wheels of industry must move again. Our people must work, but until they do, they can not and must not starve. I have voted for measures in this Congress that I would not support in normal times or under ordinary circumstances, but the cry of needy men, women, and little children for help constantly in our ears must not go unheeded. If it does, we will fall into national disgrace and dishonor.

Our Government does not owe its citizens a living, but it does owe them the opportunity to make a living. We can no longer ignore the crying need. Our people deserve recognition and assistance. Hunger has caused many a revolution and revolt. Gentlemen, we do not want these conditions added to the distress we now have. It is a stain on our society that people have to resort to hunger marches and strikes in order to picture their plight.

The greatest Leader of all time taught us "to love one another" and "feed the hungry." Now is the time to express our willingness to care for those in need.

Conditions have arisen which demand prompt and vigorous public action in order to prevent millions of worthy but destitute American citizens from further suffering actual want, privation, and hunger.

The emergency is so pressing that immediate action by the Government and an emergency appropriation from the Federal Treasury are urgent and necessary. I am quite sure that we would all prefer that private benevolence provide relief for this terrible situation. However, the excellent and worthy work of our relief organizations must be supplemented and aided by an emergency appropriation from our Federal Treasury for the relief of such a crisis as now confronts us.

I am not unmindful of the steps taken and action contemplated by our Government to relieve these sad and deplorable conditions. But we owe this immediate duty to our people in order to relieve millions of men, women, and little children now on the verge of starvation. We have boasted about our prosperity. To argue that we are not able to expend a few millions for food for our needy and destitute is unreasonable, untenable, and not in keeping with our past or the humanitarian spirit of our great Nation. This must be done at once to prevent the pangs of hunger from causing the spread of revolutionary and bolshevistic doctrines.

We have spent billions of dollars for war. In times of peace we spend millions for our Army and Navy to secure and perpetuate the cause of liberty and free government. Can we not afford to spend a few millions under the general welfare clause of our Constitution—a strikingly smaller amount to relieve destitution and suffering among our own citizens? We must not hesitate in the face of evident distress, grief, and destitution. It is no time to quibble or argue. Delay may prove more costly. It might endanger our Government and institutions. Measures proposed and those which I have supported provide the direct way that relief and help can be given to innocent and suffering men, women, and babes, who are in no way responsible for existing conditions. The American people have always heeded the call of suffering humanity at home and abroad. Under the general welfare clause of our Constitution, we have made many appropriations of this nature. Many times we have helped the suffering peoples of other lands. The great heart of America has never failed to respond to a plea for help in time of need and distress. Many times we have appropriated money for the relief of distress of those at home and abroad. We have many precedents for this act.

Our Government has gone to the aid and help of the starving women and children in Belgium, France, and other States. We have appropriated $20,000,000 for the relief of the people of Russia. At the close of the war we gave our suffering allies $100,000,000. Austria received over $70,000,000 in food from our Government. Relief has been given to Germany, Ireland, India, Cuba, and China—to the suffering people of Italy and Japan. Under the guise of loans, which never have and never will be repaid, our Government has furnished millions of dollars in supplies and foodstuffs to foreign countries, aggregating the enormous sum of more than $200,000,000, including advances made by the American Relief Administration and the United States Grain Corporation.

Mr. Chairman, our country is rich, great, and wealthy. We love and cherish our institutions, our ideals, our Government. We have passed and are going to pass measures to relieve distress and, we hope, hasten good times. Multitudes of men, women, and little children are suffering and will suffer during the winter unless we assist our private relief agencies by an emergency appropriation to help relieve the distress and suffering resulting from the widespread unemployment and business depression existing throughout the country. Let us help bring about a brighter day and help relieve suffering and sorrow in our land as we have helped to do in other lands. If Congress will vote this measure, I am confident that it will help bring hope and courage to millions of hungry or discouraged men, women, and children throughout the United States.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding that the wheat which has been distributed by the Red Cross has not reached the places where it is most needed, I still believe that the Red Cross is in a much better position to distribute it than the governors of the respective States.

Mr. LARSEN. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to the fact. However, I want to supplement what has been stated by the two gentlemen from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. CELLER] as to the need of this legislation.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] has stated that the people in the city of Detroit are in danger of starvation. What applies to Detroit applies to the great city of Chicago. In that city, in which the Republican Party holds its convention this very day, and which party had four years ago pledged four years of plenty, employment, and high wages, there are nearly 650,000 men out of employment, on whom another 1,500,000 lives depend. Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I have cooperated with and aided in and voted for every piece of legislation to relieve the farmers of the country, although the starving people in the city of Chicago have not received a bushel of this wheat or a pound of this flour, notwithstanding that it, like several other large cities in the United States, pays into the Federal Treasury more money in the form of revenue than a great many States.

I think it is manifestly unfair and unjust that the people in the cities and in the large centers of population who need the food most should be deprived of this relief, aid, and assistance.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.
